COLONEL MORRISON.—The Englishman is offended with our remarks on his article relative to our late Governor. "Does the Friend of India, by speaking of the language usually adopted regarding setting lunaries and rising suns, mean to say that the Englishman has shown itself guided by the supposed moon system, in giving its estimate of public characters at the proper season?" No. We do not mean to say that the writer of that article would have shrunk from the publication of his sentiments at any time; still it cannot be denied on the one hand, that the character of a setting lunary is often depreciated by the press, or on the other, that an article of this character did appear in the Englishman, as Col. Morrison laid down his office. Over this coincidence of facts we have no control, and we do not intend to offer any comment on it. The article in the Englishman appeared to be written in a tone of such undesigned severity and contempt, that, in common with the friends of the Englishman, we deeply regretted its appearance. If Col. Morrison's career in Council has not been marked by any measure or popular exertions, there is the less necessity to "conduct him to the shades of oblivion, with all the pomp of criticism." His career as Governor of Bengal was too brief, and his authority too limited to afford him the opportunity of impressing the stamp of his own character on any great public measure; but we must not forget that his influence, since his accession to the Chair, has been invariably thrown into the scale of liberality. As to his share in the so called Black Act, it may be easily forgiven, when we remember that Sir Charles Metcalfe, whom the press fulgurate with no less warmth than justice, was described by one of our contemporaries, as having had more land in it than Mr. Macaulay. Whether an acquiescence, in what is called "the Macaulay system generally," in which of course we must include his warm advocacy of the liberty of the press, be a vice or a virtue, must be left to the decision of posterity.

LETTERS FROM THE RED SEA, EGYPT, AND THE CONTINENT: BY JAMES ENSDALE, M. D.—These letters were written before Miss Martineau had instructed the world "how to observe;" consequently they belong to the era of nature, rather than to that of philosophy and art. Yet the author seems to be perfectly unconscious of his disadvantages, in visiting strange lands, without the Vade Mecum which is now at command, for helping any noodle to play the scientific observer of human nature in all its variation. And it would be cruel to disturb his self-esteem by any attempt to show how unmethodical and unskilled his observations are, compared with what they might have been.

Dr. Esdaile was one of four gentlemen who embarked in the Arab Ship Fyzeroobazee, towards the end of January 1836, to make their way by the Red Sea to England. On the 15th February they put in to Allepie for water; on the 4th March passed Socatra; entered the Straits of Bab-el-mandel at noon on the 11th; and on the 18th, arrived at Judda. Parting from his companions here, Dr. Esdaile embarked on the 24th March, in one of two Buggalows bound to Cosseir with coal for the Steamers; and this voyage of 400 miles he made at the rate of sixteen miles a day, with abundance of discomfort. On the 30th April he started from Cosseir, on a camel, and at day break of the 24th, reached the margin of the inundated land of Egypt, and soon arrived at Genneh on the Nile. From the 26th April to the 3d May, he was employed in an excursion to Thebes, 25 miles up the river, and hastily surveyed the wonders of Luxor, Karnak, Gurnou, the Memnonium, and Medinet Habou. On the 6th May he embarked in a boat to descend the Nile, and in the evening visited Deudera. The Pyramids of Sakharah came in sight on the 15th, twenty miles off; and on the 17th he reached Cairo. We find him in Alexandria on the 30th; and on the 3d June he embarked in the Steamer for Malta. The passage took seven days, and then followed confinement in the Lazaretto till the 1st July. The voyage from Malta to Naples was made in a Neapolitan Steamer in two days; and this point of his progress was gained on the 10th of July. On the 30th he is at Rome; and on the 15th August at Florence, from whence his last letter is dated. His readers he desires to go and see for themselves, Pisa, Genoa, Turin, Savoy, Switzerland and the Rhine, by which he made the remainder of his route home. On the whole, he was seven months on his way, and spent £200.

In these seven months, our author passed through scenes that might well occupy as many years. But he does not fall into the mistake of presenting his observations to the public, as an adequate description of what is to be seen in the range of his travels. He simply records the impressions he received, in order to invite others to go and enjoy the same pleasure he has himself experienced. And his impressions are worth knowing. He has a quick eye, a correct taste, and sound good sense. His language too is natural and spirited. We could have wished he had been more sparing of his puns and small wit; that he had avoided jesting with even the profanations of sacred things; and that he had not put it on record, that he could, on an occasion, vent his passion in an oath. It appears singular, too, that he could pass through the marvels of Egypt without being struck, as so many have been, with the confirmations and illustrations they afford of the Mosaic Records. But, notwithstanding, in his Letters, he is a very pleasant travelling companion; and we are very much obliged to him for his conversation.

On leaving Bengal he gives his Correspondent in Europe the substance of his experience of India. It is upon the whole just, but shaded rather darkly with the feelings of an invalid. When off Cape Comorin, at the extremity of our Indian empire, he takes his survey of the whole together; and his judgement, respecting what we are ourselves acquainted with, affords the best means of knowing what credit we are to give him, when he treats of places and things of which we are ignorant. In the beginning of 1839, he would scarcely have used the language he did in 1836. The affairs of India, both at home and abroad, are now quite sufficiently disturbed to furnish as much excitement as either rulers or quidnuncs can reasonably desire. But thus Dr. Esdaile expresses himself:

"I believe that no country in the world gives its rulers so little trouble as India. The affairs of India from Cape Comorin, to the Himalayahs, give less trouble than Ireland. There is an absolute dearth of political excitement here; the machinery of this great empire going on like the routine of a counting-house. If internal peace, and freedom from external aggression were signs of good government, then are our subjects in India, the best governed people in the world. But "one swallow does not make a summer," and if the country is now freed from plundering Pindarries, and marauding Maharrats, it is still kept poor by the heavy exactions of a strong, and irresponsible Government, and by the grinding of the poor by the rich. It will take centuries of such enlightened Government as Lord Bentinck's to do justice to India. He is almost the first Governor who seems to have thought that India was given us for some higher purpose, than to act as a milch cow to suckle English gentility, and thought that this great country ought to be governed on other principles, than the right of conquest. Believing that general education, and the introduction of our arts and sciences are more likely to prolong our sway to an indefinite period, than great armies, a contemptuous treatment of the natives, and the exaction of taxes from places of trust, and emolument. The separation arising from the progress of knowledge will be slow, and gradual, effected at a very remote time, and friendly when it does come. But while might, is our only right, it is impossible to foresee errors; as we have risen by accident, so it is likely that we may be as suddenly depressed by some popular conclusion, on the appearance of some lucky adventurer, having behind us no better men than our predecessors, Alexander, Timur, and Nadir Shah. But a better name for us, and brighter days for India have now dawned, and if the principles of government promulgated by Lord Bentinck, viz., general, and scientific education, social, and legal equality, and the admission of native talent and worth to places of trust and emolument—if these be carried into effect by his successor, I doubt not that India will become not only a great, but a learned country. For the natives have great quickness of apprehension, wonderful application, retentive memories, a natural love of business, are very curious, and make rapid progress in our language, and knowledge when their minds are directed to a rational course of study. They will excel, I think, in the more abstruse branches of science from their inveterate patience, and perseverance. The Hindoo youths in Calcutta are now greedily learning English, for teaching which, there are now schools all over the country, and we have in Calcutta numerous papers, "Enquirers," "Reformers," "Hindoo Pioneers," &c. all written in English by natives, and edited by the Hindoos, and very creditable they are, both in matter, and manner, and English poetry, written by Hindoos, and would often be very superior "Annual" writings. It is remarkable that the Hindoos have taken the start of the Mahometans in the career of improvement. The latter still retain the contempt of conquerors for peaceful employment, and learning, and will not condescend to enter upon a scramble for eminence, to be attained only by industry, and talent, and not by their sword, and spear, or through hereditary privileges, and prescriptive rights. They think that the "wisdom of their ancestors" excuses their present ignorance, and expect riches, and power through their works of supererogation. Out of the fifty youths who have entered the new Medical College, there is not one Mahometan: even the Brahmins, urged by the "March of Intellect," are laying aside their divine right to indolent enjoyment, at other people's expense, and are seen in various capacities earning servants' wages."

We shall now leave the shores of India, and accompany Dr. Esdaile to the Red Sea; which having to describe as it really very blue, and almost black, he has occasion, like the Sailor whose doggerel we noticed last week, to quote the learned example, locus a non locudo. Whether from his own observation is not said; but he gives the specific gravity of the Red Sea as 1.035, and that of the open ocean as 1.028, and by this pre-eminence in saltness, accounts for the deep colour of the water: on what principle we are now aware. The Red Sea is one thing, however, at its entrance.

and another towards its head; and our author's voyage in the Beggalo gave him ample opportunity of observing it. At this farther stage of his progress he writes: "The coral reefs of the Red Sea are its great peculiarity, they stud both sides of it thickly, for ten or twenty miles, and even in mid channel there are numerous islands. They are in such numbers that we pass several hundreds daily, of all sizes, at all depths below the surface; and some are well raised above the water, and covered with low brushwood. They are as beautiful as dangerous, and give a very singular aspect to the sea. A halo, of almost prismatic colours, surrounds each island. The deep blue of the Sea is suddenly converted into a vivid green on the sides of the rock, which gradually passes into red, brown, and white tints, according to the depth of the coral below the water; this repeated in large and small patches, as far as the eye can reach, gives the sea a very gay, and unique appearance, to which the white breakers over the shoals greatly contribute." * * * * The sea has originally flowed at the foot of the mountains which bound it, and still does so in some places; but generally, there is a low beach of from two to six miles composed entirely of reclaimed coral reefs, and the debris of shell fish. Numerous creeks and basins intersect it; into one of which we ran, at sunset, and anchor for the night. The leeward of a reef is equally safe; for the water is there quite smooth, though a heavy surf may be outside." In such situations, the tedium of the voyage was a little relieved by fishing. The fish are abundant and excellent, and contrast advantageously with the "animated mud" of India, as Dr. Edulji calls the inhabitants of our rivers, with too sweeping a condemnation.

The casual ride across the desert was not at all to the taste of our author. He had nearly finished the journey, and been almost jolted to death, before he learned to accommodate himself to the camel's motion; but like a good Christian, he gives instructions to those who may follow him, to save them from similar miseries. His fauques seem to have put him out of tune for a traveller's great occupation of sight seeing; for when he gets to the Nile, and the wazels of Thebes, some time is required for him to gain the feeling that there is any thing very marvellous about them. But at length he catches the spirit of the place; and here is a sample of his descriptive power:

"20th April.—I have been busy all to-day, and yesterday, in exploring the temple of Luxor, in which I live. It occupies two hundred, and eighty-two paces; in length, and the front is seventy-one in breadth, along the bank of the Nile, the front looking down the river, and the other extremity overlooking a slow bend of the river. The front is two-thirds buried in sand and consists of two great oblong, square towers, separated in the middle, by a door way. These pyramidal moles are twelve paces thick, (say yards) and are surrounded by a hanging cornice—the masses are at present unconnected, the lintel of the gate way having fallen in. On each side of the door, is a huge sitting Colossus, of blue, lightly polished granite; one is hurled to the middle of the breast, the other is clear to the knees, on which the fore-arms rest. Half the faces have been vertically struck off, but the bodies, and great extinguishers they both wear as caps, are perfect, and the polish not in the least eroded; a flat back-board runs up behind each, and is covered with hieroglyphics. They are of one stone, but I cannot speak of their exact size; it will give some idea of it, to say, that when standing on a level with their chests, my head touches the chin of one of them. They are lumbering affairs, and only surprisingly big. A little in advance of them, stands the remaining obelisk. There were two originally, but the other is now in Paris. I do not greatly admire the figure of an obelisk, but this is beautifully tapered, and is a very fine object, independent of its wonderful size, and the highly finished deep hieroglyphics, with which it is covered on all sides. Its state of preservation is marvellous, the surface is as fresh, and the polish as smooth, as if it had been finished last year, instead of three thousand years ago. I suppose thirty feet are exposed, one third being probably buried. It is likely the French thought this, the finer of the two, as it has been cleared to some depth, but they have desisted on laying bare a great gap in one of the angles. The image-breakers were welcome to the images, if they had spared the obelisk. What we see of the front of the temple is not very imposing; apart from the size of the materials, nor do I think it could ever have been very grand. The most interesting part are the figures with which both sides are covered. This being the side most exposed to the prevailing wind up the Nile, carrying quantities of sharp granite dust from the Desert, the figures are not so sharp in their outline, as elsewhere. But where the enemy's, or the faustic's chisel has not been at work, to destroy the record of former defeat, or the objects of religious abhorrence, all is quite distinct, and where figures tell the story, intelligible enough. The left side has suffered least from these causes, and after two deep lands of hieroglyphics running all along below the projecting cornice, we have a field of figures filling the rest of the front. Of hieroglyphics I will say nothing, because I know nothing, though I can distinguish a "hawk, from a head-saw;" and by the way, two ankhs, one certainly of a hawk, and the other, uncommonly like a hand-saw, occur very often. The figure story is a tale of war, and victory on the side of the Egyptians. The troops of both sides, fill each a half of the field, and are represented marching to meet in the centre, where the great scene of action is. The soldiers are charioteers, spearmen, and swordsmen, and each regiment is preceded by a vapouring person carrying a shield like a bass fiddle. The figures are about a foot long, awkward, and angular in outline, and stiff jointed like wooden dolls. The profiles are very various, and finely executed, and are a study for the physiognomist. In former days, when an officer tested the discipline of his troops by trying if they could wink, when he shook his cane before their eyes, these troops would have been called "highly soldierlike in appearance," as their hair is soaped, and tied back to admiration.

"The Egyptian general leads on his army, standing conspicuous, as large as life, in his war chariot drawn by two prancing horses. He bends his bow, (a true English Yessau!) in good Robin Hoodlike fashion, the grey goose feather nodding the tip of his ear, and the smiles are conveyed all round him. But somehow has already declared in favour of the Egyptians, the enemy is in full retreat before the hero, and his chariot is surrounded by heaps of upset chariots, dead horses, and dead men, lying in most admired confusion like so many tops shaken out of a bag. The vanquished survivors are on their knees, begging quarter from the Egyptians, who answer with a threat, and a "down I down!" &c. One part off, the advancing enemy marches swayed by a great serpent, perhaps to show that their fate is already decided; an "ex post facto" prediction doubtless, but confidence, is rewarded by success. For we see the same band again repeated, bound, and captive within the deadly folds of another serpent; and the captives will probably be sacrificed to it; for somewhere, a row of kneeling captives is seen, and an executioner is striking off their heads in rotation. On the other half of the front, the same subject is continued. The conquering hero is seated in triumph, and troops of bound captives are led to his feet. He is again repeated, looking the other way, and standing in his war chariot, dealing his winged death, like an Apollo, and scattering the enemy by his single prowess. The crowd before him has been industriously chiselled all over, perhaps by the enemy, at least uppermost, who took this mode of making their friends, "fere white." But we cannot "dream to lasting fame" the perpetrators, for Arabs, Persians, Greeks and Christians have succeeded each other, as conquerors, and have been equally barbarous to Egyptian art. At the sides of the door-way, the happy hero is being presented by Isis, with what looks like two oranges—a very grateful offering, I should think, after his labours in the dusty plain, and the most agreeable part of the affair to my mind. Passing through the gate-way, a narrow stair-case pierces each side of the front, and leads up to the top of the temple; there is some difficulty in squeezing past several large blocks of stone, which have fallen down. Arrived at the summit, you see the great size of the stones of which the building is composed, and that the disappointment in this respect, in viewing it, "en face," is from the ends of the stones being presented to view—a decided oversight for effect. The stones are two and a half yards in length, and one and a half yard in width, and thickness. From this point of view, some idea of the extent of the former city may be formed, for there is not a vestige of it remaining, but these temples, and palace temples, on the other side of the river. The city has reached from mountain, to mountain, filling the whole width of the valley, about six miles broad here, and from what I saw, and passed through coming here, and from what I saw, and passed through coming here, I should be disposed to give it ten miles in length—scope, and verge enough, even for the "hundred gates of Thebes." But these gates are supposed to mean the gate-ways of the different temples, as Thebes had no walls, at least no trace of them remains."

Here we shall close our notice for the present; and next week we shall leave the antiquities, and give our attention to Dr. Esdalla's observations on existing men and things.

BURMESE AFFAIRS.—We have devoted rather a large portion of our space to the re-publication of a journal kept by the American Missionaries at Ava, during the memorable period when Tharawaddie was mounting the throne. It records circumstances as they arose, and bears every indication of simplicity and impartiality. We think it will amply reward the labour of the reader, and give him a clearer view than he has yet had of the events of that period.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 20.

Strong suspicions having been long entertained, that the late king of Oude had not come by his death honestly, an investigation has for some time been conducted at Lucknow by orders of the Supreme Government, and orders have just been issued to the Resident of Lucknow to arrest four persons suspected of the murder.—The draft of a New Act for the regulation of Bills of Exchange has just been published by the Legislative Council.—The subscription among the gentlemen of the Medical Service for Miss Emma Roberts, in consideration of her having advocated their interests, amounts this day to One Hundred Rupees.—Intelligence has been received from the ARMY OF THE INDUS at Candahar, to the 10th of May. The troops had not experienced that plenty which they had expected on reaching this city. Provisions were still enormously dear, and the troops were still upon short allowance, nor was there any immediate prospect of relief. The crops then on the ground would not be ready for the sickle for a month. On the 8th of May, the ceremony of installing Shah Soojah took place, when all the troops were paraded before him. Few of his own subjects attended on the occasion.—The rebel sirdars had not made their submission, as was previously reported, but having sent off their wives and children, had taken refuge in Girik, a strong walled town, about seventy-three miles on the road to Herat. A small detachment of Europeans and Natives, and Artillery, was ordered to proceed against the place on the 12th of the month.—The Englishman of this morning gives, what he considers, more authentic intelligence regarding the health of Rautjee Singh than has yet been obtained. For four months he has been without the power of speech, and carries on the Government entirely by gesticulation. The consequence is, that the administration of affairs has fallen into the utmost disorder, and to this cause is to be traced the refusal of the troops to advance into the Khybur Pass without payment from the British Government.—The change consequent on the elevation of Sir William Cassement to Council, are, the appointment of Lieutenant Col. Stuart to be Secretary to Government, of Major Cebit to be Deputy Secretary, and of Capt. R. H. Birch, to be Assistant Secretary.—A serious accident has just befallen the new Parsee temple building by the followers of Zoroaster in Calcutta. The portico gave way yesterday morning, when one man was killed, two were wounded, and three severely injured.—The soi-disant Rajah of Bardwan, Purnea, Chanda, has just presented a petition to the Court, which has sentenced him to a fine for false personation, praying for a new trial, on the ground chiefly that in the trial at Hooghly he abstained from bringing forward all the evidence in his possession to prove his identity.—The prospectus of a new Cathedral, put forth by the Bishop, has been sent to the various papers. We have transferred it to our own columns. His Lordship makes the magnificent donation of one-half his allowance, for fast years, or 10,000 Pounds Sterling.—The Police fines during the last year, amounted to 13,620 Rupees.

FRIDAY, JUNE 21.

At the last meeting of the Landholder's Society, Baloo Taraknath Sen offered to undertake the translation of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat's Circulars, and requested the Society to submit his application to Government, upon which the Society came to the resolution that its objects were not such as to permit their interference in the matter.—It is confidently stated, that the report of the Municipal Committee is completed, and that the draft of it is now before Government.—Yesterday at noon, a Royal salute was fired from the ramparts of Fort William, to announce the anniversary of Her Majesty's accession to the throne.—A piece of ground exceeding an acre in extent, it is said, been purchased by Government for the purpose of being converted into a burial ground.—The Court of Directors have, it is said, determined to allow a limited number of annuities to be granted to the members of the Civil Service, at a quarter of the value of full salaries, as long as the Assets of the fund will allow it.—A Correspondent of the Englishman states, though we know not on what authority, that a proposition respecting the abolition of the Military Orphan Society, is now under the consideration of the Army at large. If this be a true statement, it is much to be regretted, that an institution of so useful a character should have been brought to the ground.—The death of the Rajah of Cooh Behar is announced in the papers. He died at Calcutta, and hence, though his style of living was not that of a Hindu, he is sure of impunity in the next world. The number of his wives amounted to 1200. His whole life was passed in the zenana, and all business was left to his ministers.

SATURDAY, JUNE 22.

The city of Calcutta was visited on Thursday night, with a thunderstorm of the most awful description. The thunder and lightning exceeded any thing within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Strange to say, the surrounding country was passed over unharmed. The casualties occasioned by the electric fluid were truly appalling. A sloop filled with jute, was struck with lightning, and the cargo set on fire. The vessel drifted, and got among the shipping, threatening them with destruction. One vessel burned blue lights, another fired guns, and thus the vessels in the port were put on their guard. After she had brushed by two ships, the boats which were sent to her assistance, succeeded in towing her across the water, when she burned down to the water's edge. The cargo belonged to that ill-fated ship, the Beugal, which has twice returned from sea in distress, and on the last occasion, transhipped her cargo into the schooner, instead of landing it; and it has now been totally destroyed by fire.—According to the calculations of the Bombay papers, we shall yet be obliged to wait another week for the next overland Mail.—A conspiracy to destroy the English authorities at Poona, has not been discovered and detected. Information was given to one of the officers, that at night fall, four thousand men within the city were prepared to attack the English, and to cut the throats of every man who wore a neckcloth. Immediate preparations were made to resist the attack. Ammunition was served out to the troops, the guns were drawn out, and an express sent to Kierke, for the cavalry. While these preparations were in progress, four men were caught in the act of offering four or five thousand Rupees to the gun-lascars to spike the cannon. They were secured; the troops were under arms all night; the readiness which was manifested, destroyed the schemes of our enemies. We may soon expect to obtain further particulars.—In the latter death of news which prevails in Calcutta, the papers are engaged in discussing the character of a prodigiously wonderful clock, which has just come out from England, and may be seen at Pinar and Co.'s, for nothing.—The Indian Journal of Science, of the present month, contains a Memoir of the Rev. Henry Fisher, the Senior Chaplain of this establishment, in which Dr. Corby informs the public, that the Cathedral has not fired, though it contains an exquisite picture by Zoffani, and that the Old Church is always full, though it has no pictures at all!

MONDAY, JUNE 24.

The papers confidently announce that orders have been sent to increase the advance on shipments to England, by six crores of Rupees. Other accounts state, that in consequence of the failure of the Opium revenue, Government will be constrained to open another loan.—During the storm on Monday night, the Jellying dat, which is constructed of iron, was struck with lightning, which was attracted by the mast. It is said to have done little damage.—The number of American vessels likely to visit Calcutta during the present season, will, it is said, exceed to an enormous extent, the number of the next year; that it will, in fact, be forty per cent. more the occupation of the country.—The report that Col. Young had resigned the Secretaryship of the Union Bank, which was confidently reported last week, is now tacitly retracted.—A rumour has gained ground, that the wisest and most prudent dealers in Opium, are pushing a strenuous contest in England for the restoration of the trade, and that there is some little probability of their success.—Comet Chapman, who contrived to swindle so many of our tradesmen, and to evade his escape, was subsequently seized and placed in confinement. We now hear, that he has again made his escape, by giving the sentinels drink, in which he had infused an opiate.—The Chamber of Commerce of Bombay has addressed the new Governor, soliciting a continuance of that valuable assistance and support which they had experienced from his predecessor. Sir James Carnac replied, in the most affable terms, that in every thing that concerned the commercial affairs of the community, he should be happy to receive the suggestions of so experienced and intelligent co-association.—The pilot who took out the Lutworth, has been taken to Madras, that vessel in consequence of foul weather having been unable to make the pilot station.

TUESDAY, JUNE 25.

The official returns of the Magistrate's office at Agra show, that the number of children carried off by wolves in the months of April and May, amounted to one hundred and forty-four. The number of wolves killed during that time was only thirteen.—Surgeon Hombesberger, the physician of Lumsingh, has sent a letter to the Agre Chikhar, contradicting the reports of his master's death, and stating, that there was no immediate danger to be apprehended.—The last accounts from Joudpore appear to be of a more decisive character than usual. Four times has Col. Sutherland repeated negotiations with the Rajah Man Singh; but having failed in bringing him to reason, he has now finally quitted his territorious and cruel. There is no alternative now, but the sword which must be unsheathed. A vigorous line of policy in Rajpootana is likely to do no little service to the British interests there.—The latest letters from China mention, that the Company's agents, Messrs. Axtell and Taylor had removed their office from Canton to Macao, where they will be secure from the violence of the Commis-sioner Lin—H. M. S. Cowsey sailed on Saturday last, for Trincomalee, where she will wait the Admiral's orders. It is understood, that she takes treasure to Madras.—The Englishman states, that if there should be any operations for the British troops to the west of Candahar, it is probable that the Governor General will not return to the Presidency this year.—A rumour is abroad, that a case of breach of promise of marriage is likely to attract the attention of the Supreme Court. The charges, it is said, is brought by the Gentleman against the Lady.—The Ganges steamer has recently made the voyage from Calcutta to Chittagong in the incredibly brief period of two days.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 26.

The account of a daring robbery at Vishim is given in the Bombay papers. A band of fifty men, fully armed, proceeded to the house of a wealthy Native and having overpowered the police and overcome all opposition, carried off property to the amount of 800 Rupees.—Domschur Setti, the successful student of the Medical College and was recently appointed to the office of Sub-assistant Surgeon at Agra, has reached that Station.—At the date of the last accounts, Col. Wade with the Sikhs had not yet got through the Khyber Pass, and Native reports state, that it is strongly defended by a son of the late Mahomed Khan. The Colonel is of opinion that the death of Ranjeet Singh, would immediately lead the Sikh army advancing against Cabul to retrograde. The Agre Chikhar reviewed this morning, states "most authentically" that he has lately become worse, and lingers without a hope of recovery. Sir Francis was his health, that his European officers were not allowed to visit him lest they should observe it.—A report is come by way of Bombay, that the troops sent against the fugitive Candahar chief at Girk have met with much treatment; but the number of killed and wounded on both sides is stated with so much exaggeration, that the whole story appears apocryphal.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—Presuming that your columns are open to any one who has no subject in view, but that which appears to permeate your paper, and that, however opinions may differ, there can be no objection to the proper expression of such, when there is the "sensus communis recti," I beg leave to request your insertion of the following observations, imperfect as they may be deemed.

Monotonous as events both Eastward and Westward may be considered, interlarded as our politics are, Asiatic and European, it strikes me that too much alarm is occasionally felt in regard to the information, which, through various sources and by various means, travels through this great Empire.

I believe Sir J. Malcolm was of opinion, that there never was a time when a more or less of a confederacy did not exist. In troublous times like the present, we may well expect advantage to be taken of circumstances by third-disposed to our prejudice.

I think the moral power we possess is far in excess of any antagonist one that can be exercised by any classes anxious to deride themselves upon our ruin;—and with this impression, I would rather that any such case that might even exist, were unacknowledged. For one, I doubt the existence of the case, and therefore, am opposed to the exercise of any harsh measure towards suspected enemies.

"Too honests quot sententia" cannot be ever disputed—and I think the expression of the latter is preferable to their suppression, does regard being had to the mode and time of their appearance.

Should what has been thus hastily thrown together meet with any attention, I propose from time to time to transmit occasional reflections on passing and probable events. Your paper is of course open to all—I think even evil opinions had better be expressed than concealed, as the antidote is always at hand, though I hope not to find such, as I have but thus cursorily expressed, so considered.

Leaving it to yourself to give publicity to the foregoing, as you may deem most advantageous,

I remain,

"Evil be thou my good."—MILTON.

By JOHN H. MERRILL, Esq.

"Evil be thou my good"—in rage

Of disappointed pride,

And hating vengeance at his God,

The epitome Angel cried.

"Evil be thou my good"—repeats,

But to a different sense,

The Christian taught by faith to trace

The scheme of Providence.

So deems the hermit, who abjures

The world for Jesus' sake;

The Patriot midst his dungeons bars,

The Martyr at his stake.

For he who happiness ordained

Our beings only end—

The God who made us, and who knows

Whither our wishes tend,

The glorious prize hath station'd high

On virtue's hallow'd mound,

Guarded by toil, beset by care,

With danger circled round.

Virtue were but a name, if vice

Had no dominion here,

And pleasure none could taste, if pain

And sorrow were not near.

The fatal cup we all must drain

Of mingled hills and woe;

Urania's cup would tasteless be,

Or quite forget to flow.

Then cease to question Heaven's decree,

Since Evil, understand,

Is but the tribute nature pays

PROPOSALS FOR ERECTING A NEW CATHEDRAL.

Bishop's Palace, Calcutta, June 18, 1859.

1. The Bishop begs permission to submit to the Gentry of Calcutta, of the Stations in the Bengal Government and the Upper Provinces, and to the friends of religion in India generally, both here and at home, the following statement, with the view of ascertaining what aid he may calculate upon in erecting a Church on the Esplanade of Calcutta, in a manner worthy of British India, and such as may hereafter be constituted, if circumstances should permit, the Cathedral of the See.

2. It has been long felt and acknowledged, that a Church of considerable magnitude is most urgently needed for the inhabitants of Chowringhee and its neighbourhood. But it may not perhaps be generally known, that the last of a succession of private plans formed during the space of fifteen years, for building such a Church, has just been laid aside, chiefly from the difficulty of procuring subscriptions for the purchase of a site, as well as for the erection of the sacred building itself.

3. The Bishop, under these circumstances, has applied to Government; and a fine, commanding site has been granted him for this purpose, on the Esplanade, near the point where the Chowringhee and Circular Roads unite, and about a mile and half South East from Government House.

4. This site is amongst the very best Government could below, in consistency with the regulation that no building should be erected within a certain range of the Fort. It is a most convenient also in itself, with reference to the necessities of the Christian population in and around Calcutta.

It is very near the centre of a circle embracing Calcutta on the North; and Ballygunge, the neighbourhood of the Marine Parade, Tollygunge, part of Entally and the Circular Road, Alipore, and Garden Reach, on the East, South, and West; where the multitude of European Residents, distant from two to four miles from Calcutta, would surprise any one who had not lately visited the several localities. Indeed, the southern part of Chowringhee alone, crowded as it is with houses of itself demands a Church.

This site is also likely to increase every year in relative importance. For as the City of Calcutta becomes more and more occupied by offices and houses of merchandises, which the increase of its commerce in consequence of steam communication is already rapidly occasioning, it is probably that Chowringhee, taken as a centre point, will become the spot around which the main body of the whole Christian Community of Calcutta will be collected.

At the same time, it is near enough to Calcutta, itself to accommodate, during the cold weather, the numerous Gentry who arrive from England, or who flock to it from all parts of Bengal and the Upper Provinces, and indeed from every quarter of India, and who are now incapable of obtaining accommodation in the existing Churches.

For nine months out of the twelve, in fact, the distance of Chowringhee and the neighbourhood from the Churches in Calcutta, exposes even those who have regular pews or sittings in them, to the greatest inconvenience—which the dubiousness of the actual attendance in the hot season, compared with about two of the main sittings in every one of the Churches are let, sufficiently prove.

5. This seems, accordingly, the very spot for erecting a sacred Edifice, capable of becoming the Cathedral of the Metropolis of India. Nor is there any place in the world, where every facility for attending public worship ought so much to be afforded as in Calcutta, where the oppressive nature of the climate, the imperfect health of the Christian population, and the danger from the least exposure to the sun, concur with want of that Christian sympathy and association which prevail at home, to make the habits of attending Church languid and unstable.

6. It is proposed, therefore, to erect a lofty, spacious, airy Church—in the Gothic, or rather Christian, style of architecture; unencumbered with galleries; with an ample chancel or choir; with North and South transepts, and a square tower about 200 feet in height from the ground, should be added, to give the whole a becoming and customary Ecclesiastical aspect.

7. In correspondence with this necessary magnitude of the body of the edifice, it is designed that the exterior of the building should bear some relation in its architectural character to the interior; and that an appropriate spire, somewhere about 200 feet in height from the ground, should be added, to give the whole a becoming and customary Ecclesiastical aspect.

8. It was indeed, the unavoidable extent of a building, which could at all meet the actual wants of the case in a climate like Bengal, that first suggested the idea of erecting it in an open and beautiful spot, and of such a style of architecture, as to form a prominent object from every point of view on the Esplanade, within the fine panorama of Calcutta; and thus constitute the greatest ornament of what has not been unduly termed, the City of Palaces. And it was thought there are few who would not willingly make an additional effort, if we once determine to build a new and large Church—to give it all the advantages, which the progress made of late years in sacred architecture can secure, so as to render it fitting to be the rival of the most magnificent Cathedral erected to the honour of God in India.

9. The present is, moreover, a critical moment. A site in every respect eligible has been most handsomely granted us by Government, for which our warmest acknowledgments are due; but if we do not now erect on it a Church which shall unite the supply of our local wants with some regard to the requirements of Calcutta, it is hardly possible that the opportunity should recur; as private plans will undoubtedly be framed with a view to local and personal interests and thus the probability of possessing a Cathedral be lost for ever.

10. In fact, it has long been a subject of reproach, not only to the good taste but to the piety of the greatest Empire in the Eastern world, that our Government House, our Mint, our Town Hall, our Custom House, our Bridges, and even our Churches, as say nothing of our official residences and private dwellings—should be upon a scale in some measure correspondent with the position we hold in India, whilst our Cathedral is mean, inappropriate, and incongruous. The Churches which are set apart for Cathedrals at Madras and Bombay, are beyond comparison finer than the one which is so designated in the splendid and wealthy Metropolis of our whole Asiatic Dominion—CALCUTTA.

In truth, from the time of the first erection of the See of Cal-

ette, now twenty-five years since, a Cathedral has been urgently wanted, and has been thought of and projected, again and again, by the friends of our Protestant Church. The objections made from home to the one proposed to be built in 1818 by the Marquis of Hastings, and for which magnificent plans had been drawn, were entirely independent of the sacred project itself. The difficulty from that time has been to find another favourable opportunity. At length the long wished for occasion has presented itself in the demands of the new Christian neighbourhood around Choorwaring. Who will not be backward in recording a sacred structure, of such a character as may testify our gratitude to that Almighty Being who has given us India, and our sense of the obligations we are under to provide for the celebration of His holy worship, in a manner becoming the greatest of the Protestant nations?

11. It will be amongst the important advantages of a fine, spacious Church, that on the occasions of Lectures during Ecce, and the solemn seasons of Visitation, Ordination, and confirmations, there will be room for the crowded audiences that then assemble, —not to say that opportunities may arise, as Christianity advances, for collecting together, as at home, the numerous Christian Schools of Calcutta and its neighbourhood for anniversary celebration: whilst the conveniences of Native Schools and Converts schools may be ultimately incorporated. It is possible also, if a Church at all worth of Calcutta should be built, that endowments may be made by pious and well disposed individuals, and public bodies here, and at home; and our protestant services be duly celebrated, and various pious and benevolent labours amongst the surrounding Native Population be prosecuted by a body of Missionary Clergy.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL, CALCUTTA—for such is the name designed for it—thus becomes a centre of light and grace to the Heathen and Mahomedan as well as Christian Population around.

Not is the subordinate consideration to be entirely overlooked that its styles and entrances will be adapted to admit such appropriate Christian memorials to the piety and learning of the departed, as the beautiful monument to Bishop Heber by Sir Francis Chantrey, lately come out from England,—and which there is positively no spot in any of our present Churches to receive with advantage.

12. The expense is, however, the great difficulty—though not, it is presumed, an insuperable one. No good design has ever yet failed in India, from mere want of funds—and it will be strange if this should be the first. For if the subscriptions continue, as it is proposed, during the three or four years necessary to build the Church, with the payments being made by monthly or annual instalments by those who may prefer,—and if contributions be elicited from all classes of the Community all over India and at home, there is not the slightest fear of ultimate success. Small donations multiplied will soon amount to something considerable; whilst the largest will, on the other hand, come in to accomplish the extensive undertaking. Nothing is required but a spirit of determined effort; and no one surely will be wanting to the next age, by neglecting to seize the present unexpected and remarkable juncture.

It is hoped that the gentlemen who subscribed conditionally about 80,000 Rupees in 1820, and those who again contributed between 40 and 50,000 in 1838 to the private plans alluded to, will be pleased to transfer them to this noble and more adequate public object. This will be a good commencement.

13. The expenses cannot, indeed, at present be exactly ascertained, but it is supposed that something like two lakhs or two lakhs and a half of Rupees may be sufficient for the most indispensable objects in view; though the ornamental parts—the enclosure, the organ, the furnishings, painted windows, and a chime of bells, a clock, stand for carriages, &c.—will require a considerable sum in addition. But if of endowment is found practicable, the whole ultimate outlay must be carried still higher.

14. The Bishop is himself so impressed with the grandeur of the occasion, that he will cheerfully devote more than one half of the revenue of his See for four years—a lakh of Rupees in the whole—to this object. With this amount he is determined at least to begin instantly. He will advance at once the whole subscription and more when that is given. He has no fear of being deserted. Designs are already preparing by the most scientific Engineer Officer of the Service in this department—the same indeed, and designed the beautiful plans twenty years since under the Marquis of Hastings; and the works will be commenced without a day's unnecessary delay.

15. The seal for Church Building at home is one of the brightest features in the present aspect of our national affairs, and is a favourable omen of what we may expect here. Already has the flame spread to India. Already have more Churches been begun by private bounty in the last seven years, than in the seventy years preceding. Already has the munificence of an individual Military officer in rearing a beautiful Church at Delhi, entirely at his own charge, taught us how to connect ourselves with the civilisation and illumination of Hindoostan.*

Indeed there is nothing that can so permanently incorporate our affections with this country of our sojourn, as taking a part in the houses of that Christian faith which will never fade away. All else is transitory, changing, uncertain. India affords us no firm footing. We are passing through it as strangers and pilgrims. But a great opportunity is now afforded us of acquiring an abiding and permanent interest in the land, which Providence has almost by miracle committed to our care; and from which many of us have derived, for so many years, such advantages of honourable maintenance, and such prospects of future retreat at home. Surely every one will start forward with readiness to take his share in rearing this solid and enduring monument of the Christian faith and clarity of British India. No subscription list will be published—each one will be left at entire liberty to contribute what he may judge right for the glory of Christ, and the good of souls—but a record of the names of those who come meekly forward to help the Bishop in this emergency, will be laid up in the archives of the diocese.

16. The Reverend Chaplains and Missionaries, and other friends in each Station, are respectfully requested to submit these proposals to the Civil and Military Gentry and the Community of every class; and to transmit the list of Benefactors to the Reverend J. H. Pratt, M. A., the Bishop's Domestic Chaplain, or to R. Molloy, Esq., Registrar. All the monies will be placed in the Bank of Bengal; and an account rendered of them from time to time.

The sooner the names of those who intend to contribute are sent in, the better, as the amount of probable support may materially affect the details of the Bishop's plans. The first stone will be laid if it please God, before the Bishop goes up the country in October next.

DEO SOLA GLORIA

BURMAH.—JOURNAL OF MR. SIMONS, MISSIONARY AT AVA, DURING THE REVOLUTION THERE IN 1837.

Reduction of Ava by the king of Mokecho.

April 2, 1837. Lord's-day. This has been to many here a day of great anxiety. Public worship omitted. Some of us engaged in packing our things up, and others in sending our trunks to the boats. The king of Ava's forces, having made a good retreat, evacuated Sagging, and crossed the river, to defend the royal city. The city walls are crowded with soldiers, and heavy logs are being slung on the outside. These are to be cut loose, to fall upon the enemy, when attempting to scale the walls. Towards evening an advance party of the king of Mokecho's troops, under Bouda's son, arrived at Sagging. At night, they set fire to an old house on the river side, to light, it is supposed, the troops on the Ava side. This was accompanied with a successful yelling, which they continued some time, frequently calling out the names of the queen and her brother.

3. The part of the king of Mokecho's army under Tishbyu, one of his sons, arrived at Sagging this morning.

4. The advance troops of the part of the army coming to the west gate, have arrived within a mile, and the villagers are coming toward the city, in great fright. Some have run off with the little property they could carry with them. One thousand of the king of Ava's troops occupy the elephant trap, near our house, and they are making a ditch and breast-work from the residency, to the entrance of the trap, forming a semi-circle.

5. The Mekara prince, and the pongthees have returned from Mokecho, and made their report to the king. It confirms what Col. Bury had previously informed him; and the king of Mokecho requires thirteen of the principal officers of the government to meet his son at Sagging, and then he promises to cease all hostilities, and come himself to Ava. The Colonel fears treachery, and has mentioned the name to the king. He and the officers seem to have confidence in the promise of the king of Mokecho, and are willing to go over the river, but with the Colonel. The Colonel went, and saw the king, and the officers were appointed by the young prince Tishbyu, to meet them. The young prince and his men behaved very well.

7. Thah Oung, one of the young men who accompanied brother Kinead up the river, returned this morning. Immediately after Mr. K. had been taken and stripped by the robbers, this young man was called off by one of the chiefs. He acted in the capacity of a servant, and was obliged to saw his master wherever he went, and witness all the dreadful deeds of plunder and murder, which were committed in the surrounding towns and villages.

The taye-ko,* who is the commander of several hundred soldiers in Ava, is said to have offered his services to the king of Mokecho, to set fire to the city. The salen-men† has been put in front of the city, and all have been robbed. To-night 1500 men, belonging to the taye-ko's army, have been turned out of the city, and are encamped on the plain in the rear of our house. The Colonel hearing that the men had no officer with them, sent to the lot-dan to request that a responsible officer should be sent to take charge of them for the night. This being done, we all felt less anxiety, and retired to rest.

* Tishbyu a short time ago ordered a general massacre of men, women, and children, at Pagan.

† The queen's brother, and premier.

8. The king of Mokesobo arrived at Saguing. He has not brought his family with him.

9. Lord's-day. Public worship as usual. As it was my turn to preach, spoke from 1 Sam. 30: 6. "David encouraged himself in the Lord his God."

Last night a respectable ponghee, who lives in one of the monasteries on the plain, was robbed and cut with a knife very severely. He was brought to the king's this morning. The officers who went over to Saguing are yet in town, and sent back to the common jail in Ava. Others are to be seized and acceded in the same manner.

Tittingyi, the second son of the king of Mokesobo, has entered Ava by the eastern gate, with 2000 men, taken charge of the lot dan and palace, and separated the queen and her daughter from the king, and placed them in the inferior apartments of the place. Twenty-five officers are put in prison, the seven men's wife and daughters, and others, seized and tortured in prison, to make them confess where all their money and jewels were concealed; the men-don-men* imprisoned, and his property confiscated, and the yakobok, in trying to make his escape, was speared and killed.

The kyedan, a man whose name has often been mentioned in our journals, as one of our friends, called on us to seek shelter. He is a kind of steward to the men-don-men. He remained a short time, and returned home, undetermined what he should do.

10. Col. Burney, accompanied by Mr. Kincaid, visited the king of Mokesobo at Saguing. He declared himself to be king, insisted on his right to do so as placed with the officers in prison, and mentioned his desire to destroy Ava, and to make Mokesobo his capital, and that he should encourage the intercourse with foreigners, and allow money to be exported from the country. He ordered a guard to be attached to the residency, and six or seven men from it to be stationed every night at our house, to protect us.

This day we removed our families, and most valuable baggage from the Colonel's house to our own. We have occupied the lower part of the Col's house since the 23d of March, and have been kindly invited to take dinner and tea with his family during the time. We feel much indebted to Col. Burney and his lady, for their kindness to us. Col. B. has exercised himself in a noble and praiseworthy manner, to prevent bloodshed as much as possible, during the civil war, and has succeeded beyond his expectation.

11. Having heard early this morning that the females belonging to the officers in prison were being severely tortured, by flogging needlessly under their finger nails, and by other cruel means, Col. B. and Mr. K. visited the lot-dan, to intercede for them. Tittingyi and his officers prouided to behave better towards them. In the meanwhile, they were told it was the only way by which they could be made to confess where their money and jewels were concealed. They visited also the prisoners, and found them destitute of any kind of food. They obtained permission to feed them. All prisoners are either supported by their friends, or obtain their subsistence by begging. Owing to the families of these state prisoners being also in prison, they have no one who dares give them any thing. Were any of the Burmans to come forward to their assistance, they would be immediately suspected of being of their party, and would probably be seized, especially if they were known to have property.

In the afternoon, brethren Kincaid and Weeh, and myself went over to Saguing to see the king; but, owing the gate-keepers' insisting that we should put off our shoes, where it was not customary to pull them off, and walk some distance on the hot sand, we returned home without seeing his majesty. The streets were crowded with people.

At sundown, five men were brought to the place of execution, and beheaded. They were brought from Mokesobo, and said to be robbers. I arrived at the spot when the executioners were fastening the heads to the ground in a row, with short stakes drove through the mouth, leaving the face upright. The bodies were afterwards dragged to the same place, and piled one on another; they then remain there exposed for three days, and then to be interred. I was astonished to see so little feeling exhibited by the crowd, at such a melancholy sight. The man with the spotted face, with a cigar in his mouth, seemed to be as indifferent in handling the ungodly bodies, as any other persons would be in ordinary work.

12. Lieut. Bessar arrived to-day, with sepoy, to relieve the Resident's escort. He men with scarcely any difficulty in coming up the river. He met the king's army on their way to Bangoon. An officer attempted to stop him, but he came on without minding him.

13. Mr. E., the Resident's clerk, visited the king on business; found him in quite a melancholy mood. He said, he was tired of being king—he wished he was dead—he was formerly happy in his garden—he wished he had been left to remain there in quietness.

16. Lord's-day. Brother Kincaid preached. Some of the state prisoners have been released.

17. Col. B. and Mr. K. have visited the king, but nothing special was said. Both of them were allowed to walk through the gate to the steps at the entrance of the lot-dan, without pulling off their shoes.

21. The deacon's wife came in great haste this morning, to inform us that her son, Moung Tou, and her nephew, Moung Na Gas, had just returned home. She said her husband sent her off hastily to inform us of their arrival; and as she had no talk with them, she could not say where they had been, nor how they found their way home. These two young men are members of the church, and were with Mr. Kincaid when he was seized by the robbers. There is another still absent, but he is an elderly man, and well acquainted with the country. He will, no doubt, make his appearance soon.

Visited the ponghee who was stabbed by the robbers on the night of the 8th inst. On asking why they behaved so to him—a priest—a priest—he replied,—he replied, "They supposed I had money, or knew where some was hid; and because I had nothing for them, they cut me with their knives, as you see."

Near by where the priest was staying, I saw a crowd of Burmans around three Hindu fakirs. One of them was swinging, with his head downwards, from a rope fastened to a living tree, and was crying every morning, and says he has done so for some years, and is to continue a few years longer, before he will have attained that degree of purity to which he is aspiring. I spent some time in talking with them through an interpreter, of the fully of such practices, and then told them some plain truths respecting the true God, and his son Jesus Christ, and what he required Burmans, Mohammedans, (a Mohammedan fakir was in company) Hindus, and all other people to do, in order to their becoming truly good. I have seen as many as dozens of these fakirs in Ava at a time. Among them is one, whose left arm is always up, and the finger nails are about five inches long. These men travel all over the countries of Burmah and China, without the least interception. A short time ago, several of them left Ava, in company with some Kachyaus, for the purpose of going to India in some sacred stream which rises in the country in the north, inhabited by wild tribes. In their way they fell in with some wild Kachyaus, who are said to have killed three or four of them, and the rest fled.

It is reported, that an officer recently appointed at Amarapura, was crucified a few days ago. A celebrated robber Kyau, (great thief), was condemned by the king of Mokesobo, for killing, in a moment of passion, some soldiers belonging to the army, before Ava, but one of the king's sons obtained a pardon for him. This is supposed to have been asked, and granted, on account of the important assistance which this robber chief rendered to the king during the late civil war.

22. Col. Burney and Lieut. Bessar have visited the king. A man who formerly belonged to the seven-men, and who has been some time taking shelter at the Col's house, being anxious to approach the king with a proposal, accompanied them over to Saguing. By the king's order, he was seized and put in the stocks. Some think he will be decapitated.

23. Lord's-day. Last night we experienced a heavy storm of wind and rain, which drove our boats from their anchorage to the shore, where we had much trouble in the very midst of the storm, in trying to keep them from going to pieces. Our boatmen all our trunks, and the other part of our baggage. After the storm had abated, we were employed, until two o'clock this morning, in fastening the boats to the bank, securing some boxes which were likely to get wet, and stopping up the leaks. The boat which had the trunks was a new one, and did not get much injured, but the other would have sunk before day-light, if it had not bailed some of the water out, and stopped the principal leaks. As it was, we were obliged to keep two men at the pump throwing out the water. This morning as early as seven o'clock we found, we had the leaky boat unloaded. Gratitude worship omitted.

Foreigners traversing the interior objected to—Yandabo treaty not recognized by the new king.

24. Col. Burney went to the lot-dan; but there being no one then disposed to attend to business, he returned home. He informed me that Woodcock Moung Kan ya, and an officer formerly under the queen's brother, were strangled in prison. It is said, their feet were in the stocks, and they were made to recline on their backs, when a rope was fastened round their necks and drawn tight by a windlass, until they were dead. Towards evening, Col. B. received a letter from Dr. Richardson, who has been exploring the country north of Mandalay, inhabited by the Red Karens, and some tribes of Shyans. His route has been long and very difficult. To save both time and trouble, he wishes to return by Ava, to Mandalay. The Col. went over to see the king, and have some Burmans sent on to protect him from robbers through the wilderness. The king was in an ill humor, and refused to allow Dr. Richardson to come on to Ava. The Col. said he was within six days' march of Ava, and surely the king would not send him back so near the rains would soon commence, and be and his people, who are merchants, would be exposed.

passed to make him. The king replied to this, "If he were at Amara, he should go back; he had no business to come such a way as that, from Alaungmye." The Col. said it was to improve the trade between the two countries, and the treaty gave merchants a right to go any where to trade. The king instantly caught at the word trade, and said he had nothing to do with it; the Col. must go to the people who made it. After a great deal of talk of this kind, the king told the Col. that as he was his friend, if he asked his permission for Dr. Richardson to come on, as a personal favour, he would allow him, but not on account of any treaty.

25. Mr. E., the Resident's writer and interpreter, was sent for by the king. He appeared pleased, and talked of making presents to Mrs. B. and her three little sons. He intimated to Mr. B. that he wished Col. B. to acknowledge that Dr. B. had done wrong, ask his pardon, and promise he should do so no more. He would then give the royal order for Dr. B. to come on to Ava. A writer was requested to put this on a Burman bank book, in the form of a petition, for Mr. B. to carry to the Col. for his signature. A letter was now presented to his majesty from the Col., stating, in as mild and respectful a way as possible, his regret at having heard that his majesty had broken the solemn promise made to him to serve the interests of all the officers of the late government, by causing two of them to be strangled in prison; and he wished to know the cause, that he might state it in his report to his government. The king, after reading the letter threw it from him in a rage, and said, "My kingly prerogative! Have not kings the right and power to kill as many of their subjects as they please? Yes, and I will; and more are you of this mind, and I will send you to the gallows. In a month, when I ascend the throne, the black attorney shall be executed, for he deserves it. After fifteen or twenty minutes, he became calm, and requested Mr. E. to go to the Col. with the writing, and if he consents to it, Dr. B. shall be set free immediately.

26. Early this morning, Mr. E. was sent over to the king to return the writing, and to express, verbally, that the Col. could not sign such a petition, for Dr. B. had been sent with merchants, by Mr. Mundell, at the request of the Governor-General, for the purpose of improving the trade between the two countries, according to the treaty made by both; and he could not, therefore, say, that Dr. B. had done wrong, by coming the way he had. But, if the king thinks he has done wrong, and will give him his wishes in writing, to forward to the Gov. General, that hereafter no person should come into the country, except by Baungone, without first obtaining his majesty's permission, he will do so. The king was much displeased with his reply, and said, "The Col. has already assented that Dr. B. has done wrong and why should he now want to make difficulties with trades. If he wants the treaty to be in force, let him go to those who make it; let him not think that I am like those fools of the former government. I give my word, and it shall be as I say."

The people are reporting in the city, that there are difficulties between the king and the Col., and that the former has threatened to outlive the latter.

30. Lord's-day. Br. Webb preached from John 1: 1-6. Col. B. went to the 100-dan and conferred with the officers concerning treaties, and returned them to one made by the Burman government with China, which remains still in force. They proceeded to go early in the morning to beging, to see the king, and obtain the royal permission for Mr. Richardson to come to Ava, as a favour to Col. Burney. Heard that the ex-king is to be removed from his palace, to a place in the south part of the city, near the splendid pagoda which he has recently built. During the day, the ex-queen and the other queens had to walk to the thungdan barefoot, to take the oath of allegiance to the new king.

May 1. This evening the ex-king was removed. He was carried in a palanquin, the ex-queen walked on one side of it, and her daughter on the other. Tikeitgyi, the present king's son, with some officers and attendants in the front, and the three other principal queens with their followers in the rear, made up the procession. It is supposed that the king will be present.

5. To-day the king visited the elephant trap. He came in a long, narrow, gilded, royal boat, seated on the prow, having a man behind, holding a gilded umbrella over him. Several other boats of the same kind came with his sons, and others of government. The elephant which was brought in to be caught, happened to have some spots about him, the king considered it a good omen on his coming into power. He was much gratified, and made presents to the governor of the wild elephants and his men, and ordered them to take particular care of the animal, and surround it with the emblems of royalty. A white canopy was hung over it, a bamboo fence made round its shed, and pots of flowers hung on the fence.

As is usual on such occasions, many people crowded to our house, and received the scriptures and tracts, and some staid in our yard and verandah, and heard the truths of the gospel explained.

Palace of the ex-king—Capital Punishments.

A few days ago the king told the Colonel that he might go and see the royal palace, lately the residence of the ex-king and family, and take the American teachers with him. This morning we all went. Before entering the palace yard, we had an interview with Tikeitgyi, one of the king's sons, who is now premier. He was living in a neat bamboo house, near the palace gate, surrounded by the officers of government. We left this place, accompanied by the attorney, Thakun Shway-thakun, who had been requested by the king to show us around the palace. On arriving at the palace, we pulled off our shoes and left them with our umbrellas until we returned. The apartments of the king, his head queen, and three other queens, the young princes, the thirty concubines, the king's three sisters and their numerous households, with the open passages leading to them, gave the place the appearance to us of a little city. All the most of the occupants had been removed, there was very little to be seen besides the empty rooms. In one of the king's apartments were some large mirrors, by means of which his majesty could hear, when he wished, a full view of himself from head to foot. In the young prince's apartment were a variety of pictures and playthings, which were packed up ready to be removed. The thrones were at the east, west, north and south ends of the palace, and one in the centre. At the east throne the king and his wives, and at the west the queen and her attendants. Sometimes the king and queen appeared together on this throne. The throne in the centre was the grandest, and was used by the king only on particular occasions. Not far from this was a large room, enclosed with grate work, into which we were told the king usually retired to be alone, when he was very angry. Several holes remained undisturbed in a corner of one of the rooms, where the king performed his devotions. The furniture was very different from the images of Gandama which are now made. There was nothing remarkable about the thrones, excepting a number of images, of the size of children a year old, in a kneeling posture, with their faces towards the throne, and their hands joined together, and raised to their foreheads, as is the custom with the Burmans in the act of worship. The palace is built of wood, excepting one apartment which had been finished for the young prince. The walls were of brick, plastered and beautifully polished. Adjoining this was the young prince's garden, containing rosebushes, and various other choice flower trees. This was level with the floor of the palace, which is some feet from the ground. After having seen all the apartments which had been so recently occupied by the king and his numerous attendants, we were taken to the apartment still occupied by his eldest sister, she was seated on a throne, surrounded by a number of females, and seemed pleased to see us. Soon after we were seated, a younger sister, the widow of Prince Ma, came and took part in the conversation. They had many questions to ask concerning the ladies—what their ages were—whether they were married or single—what their husbands were, and what their professions—how long they had been in the country, and whether they could talk the Burman language. We (missionaries) were not prepared for the serenity of the royal ladies. When they were told that we were religious teachers, one of them said, she thought that teachers always dressed in black. It so happened that we were all dressed in white, it being more comfortable than black, when exposed to the hot sun of Ava. After sitting on the floor till we were all tired, we rose and took our leave. On arriving outside of the palace yard, we were called to see the king's son again. He presented both of the ladies with a ruby ring, (there were five in company,) and said he pitied them, because they had to return in the hot sun; but as to the gentlemen, they could endure it. We then rose from the bamboo floor, took leave, put on our shoes, and returned home.

7. Lord's-day. Services performed in the usual way.

9. This evening two men were beheaded, and another, with his arms and legs stretched out and fastened to a bamboo grating, was embowelled. One of the men who were beheaded was a very fine looking man, had been an officer some time, and was more successful than any other officer in checking the robbers above Ava. It is supposed the reason for his being beheaded, was his faithfulness to the former government, and togethly the execution of some chiefs of banditti who were very active in the late disturbance. The executioners respected him very much, and begged his pardon for what they were about to do. The poor man trembled. One of the men with the spotted face cried out, "You are a man—are you not?" He stooped down, bowed his head forward, and instantly it was off. The bamboo to which the man who was embowelled was tied, were upright, and drove falling into the ground. It appears the persons justiced in this way are left to die a painful, lingering death. This man, entrusted the executioner not to do so with him. He received one stroke with the Burman sword, which entered the left side, below the ribs, and reached the heart. He died instantly. He will remain exposed until there is nothing of him left. The men who were beheaded will be interred in three days. The man embowelled was formerly an officer at Pagan, but having lost his situation, he informed the officers of the king that the Pagan prince was collecting arms to assist her brother in a revolt against the government. On this information the officers acted, and brought on the crime much sooner than it was expected.

11. Eight persons executed at Saguing. One was a town writer, and, living near the prince's house, had taken some of his favourite pigeons, and killed them—for which he was decapitated. Another was the gate-keeper, who, it appears, hesitated to open the gate when the king ordered to Saguing. Another, the head man of the village, had given information to the government. Another, a goldsmith, was obnoxious for having some of the salesman's jewels. These were also decapitated. The fifth was a woman, who had given information concerning some hidden property. She was killed by a blow of a stick on the back of the neck. The sixth was a doctor, who gave medicine to the king to make him love the queen. He was tied up and sawn in two from the head downwards. The two last were a butcher and his wife. The man was accused of having killed a calf belonging to his majesty, and his head was split open with a hatchet. The only fault of the woman was the presentation of a petition to the king for the release of her husband. She was struck on the neck with a stick until she was dead.

14. Lord's-day. Brother Kinsaid preached. Heard unpleasant news this afternoon. We were in hopes that the king would let us alone—but no. Mr. E. having visited him to-day, he said, "Tell the American teachers that they must not give away any more of Jesus Christ's books." This makes us feel sad, but not to despair. I trust we all know from experience, that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes.

15. Mr. Bayfield and Dr. Griffiths have arrived. The latter came overland from Sadiya, and met Mr. Bayfield somewhere above Mogaung.

16. The king came over from Saguing with his family and attendants, and visited the lot-lau; but to the astonishment of all the people, he did not ascend the throne—he merely bowed to it, and tied pieces of white muslin in several places about it, and also to his own gilded umbrella. He dispenses for the present with the white umbrella. What his motives are for doing so, no one knows.

Interview with the king—Departure for Rangoon.

20. Accompanied by Kinsaid to see the king. We took with us, as presents, a map of the world, the first volume of the Child's Book on the Soul, a Burman and English primer with cuts, a bottle of cologne water, and a ball of fency soap. He was interested most with the primer and map. The Resident, Mr. Bayfield, his assistant, and Dr. Griffiths, were present also, on a visit. During their stay the king sat on his cushion, and was principally engaged in conversation with them. On their leaving, as we were teachers, the king rose up and came to us, and, stooping down, familiarly shook hands with us—would he had not seen to for some time—he remembered us during his trouble, and now it was all over he was glad to see us again. He ordered two gold watches to be brought for us to look at, which had come from the palace. He asked us if we intended to go away when Col. Burney did. We told him that we should, as the country was in an unsettled state, and he and his court were going to Kyauk-Mying, and probably to Mokesbo; but we should return again in a year, when the country would be settled. "Yes," said he, "I shall go to Mokesbo. In a year or so the country will be quiet; come back then." Now I stood erect, and with a keen eye, full of meaning, he looked towards the princes, noblemen, officers, and attendants, who were all bowed down before him, and said, with a full voice, "Little teachers, you must not give away any more of Jesus Christ's books. Formerly I could see such things done, and take no notice of them; but now I am the defender of the faith, and protect my religion." To this we made no reply, but bowed to him, to let him know that we listened to him. We then informed him, that when we returned, we designed to bring with us a printing-press, and to print books on sciences. "Yes," said he, with a strong and firm tone, "come, and print, and give away as many books on sciences as you please." Our business with him being now finished, we respectfully took leave of him and returned home.

21. Lord's-day. Dr. Webb preached. This evening a young man was brought to us by a brother who was his tutor, and embowed, and was taken to the place where the remains of his brother are. "Truly the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."

22. Reports say, a woodcut, by promising to get some of the state prisoners released, extorted from one 500 tials, another 300, and another 1000. For a short time their irons were knocked off, and they were set free. This was boasted of before the king as an instance of cleverness in the officer.

24. Lieut. Smith arrived from Manmaia. He was sent by the Commissioner, Mr. Blundell, to ascertain the situation of the Resident and family.

26. Lord's-day. Services as usual. Lieut. Smith returned to Rangoon.

* He has always called us "little teachers;" and others who log to honour us, call us great teachers. We endeavour to improve on the minds of the natives—members of the church or not—that it is wrong to make distinctions among the religious teachers; and particularly inform them, that they must not call us by the name Great Teacher, but simply teacher; that the name, Great Teacher, belongs to Jesus Christ, the son of God; and no religious teacher ought to be called by that name. If they are members of the church, we read to them Matthew xiii. 4.

29. Dr. Richardson has arrived.

June 4. Lord's-day. Dr. Kinsaid preached. This evening a man was brought to the place of execution; but his relations paid some money to have him released, and he was carried back to prison.

6. This evening, hearing that the poor man, who was to have been executed the evening before, was brought out again, I accompanied brethren Kinsaid and Webb to the place of execution to see him. He was a man about 40 years old, and had a very intelligent and respectable appearance. He was kneeling on the grass, with his hands tied behind him, having the spotted face executioners, with their swords, on each side of him. He seemed very unconcerned, said nothing to any one, but continued singing betel-nut. A great many people had collected around him. His only fanit appeared to be his faithfulness to the former government, as a military officer. His mother, wife, and children were near by, in a small hut, waiting anxiously the arrival of the royal pardon. The sun had gone down, and nothing came. The poor man was certain his fate was sealed. At eight o'clock he called his family to him to take the last farewell. At twelve o'clock he was beheaded; and this morning his head lies in the street to the ground, close by the man who was embowelled.

7. Accompanied by Kinsaid to see the king. We gave him the Three Sciences. He appeared very pleasant to us, and ordered his treasurer to give br. K. the money due to him for his losses up the river.

10. The king and court left Saguing and came to Ava, for Kyauk-Mying, a town on the left bank of the Irrawaddy, where the king intends to remain until he removes to Mokesbo, the ancient city of Alompra, which is about fourteen miles in the interior.

It is said that the state prisoners were taken from Ava to Saguing, and made to walk in procession to their boat, in presence of the king, each one having a large white talle in his hand, to remind them that they had been stirring up strife. A large oahoon was fixed at the head of the boat, into which the ladies were put.

17. Having our baggage in readiness, we took leave of the native brethren, and embarked on board of our boats, to go to Rangoon, or some other place, until the country becomes settled. Six of the brethren accompany us, besides Mr. Shoun and a Karen. There are in company about twenty boats, containing the Resident and family, Messrs. Bayfield and Richardson, Messrs. Edwards and Good, and Lieut. Bayor and his wife, and their baggage.—American Baptist Missionary Magazine, August, 1889.

EXTRAORDINARY PROCEEDINGS OF THE VICAR OF LEEDS.—About a fortnight since, the patrons of the church at Kirkstall assembled to elect a successor to the lamented Rev. Richard Hodgson, when the successful candidate was the Rev. John Ware, vicar of Christ Church, Meadow-lane. The unsuccessful candidate was the Rev. John Clark, one of Dr. Hook's onness, in whose favour the vicar exerted all his influence on that occasion. Among the individuals who recommended Mr. Ware to the patron, the Rev. Wm. Sinclair was one; and, in doing so, no doubt he thought himself perfectly justified by the fact that Mr. Ware had proved himself a martyr of true piety. Such a fact, however, was deemed by Dr. Hook no sufficient ground for a recommendation opposed to his wishes, and consequently the Rev. Mr. Sinclair was surprised in no ordinary measure, a few days back, by receiving a note from the vicar, stating, that as he had thought proper to act in such a manner, he must take notice that on a certain day (either in March or May,—we are not sure which) the pulpit at his own church (St. George's) would no longer be his, but the vicar would then take possession of it himself. Mr. Sinclair is stated to have expressed in reply, his surprise at such a communication having been sent to him because he had thought proper to make the recommendation already named, and to have desired, after taking legal advice, the power of the vicar to do what he had determined on,—viz., to expel him from the pulpit of St. George's. On this, he received a second epistle, which is said to have been couched in such distasteful terms, that he declined to allow it to the trustees of St. George's, though requested,—and the ground he did not wish to expose the vicar. Dr. Hook however, is understood to have announced that he too is acting with legal sanction, and will carry out the purpose stated in his previous note. The trustees of St. George's Church are, as may be conceived, most indignant at this proceeding of the vicar's, and are resolved to maintain, by every means in their power, the manly decision of their minister to resist so tyrannical a mandate.—Leeds Mercury.

SOCIALISM.—We have felt some hesitation in deciding whether we should set more wisely in drawing the attention of our readers to the new type of licentious atheism that has assumed the name of Socialism, thereby giving additional notoriety to what is perhaps better left to ripen, rot, and rotify in its native darkness, or in alluding to its existence as we have hitherto observed respecting it. The alleged rapid growth and extensive spread of this evil pest,—the connexion at least to a certain extent between the system of the Socialists and the political dogmas of the Chartists,—the alarming statements put forth in some recent publications,—and the deplorable effects of ascertaining the real facts,—have at length induced us to offer a few remarks upon the subject.

And first, as it is probable many of our readers may require to be informed what Socialism is, as "a religious theory," (if the term religious may be applied to the notion of all religious sects, current or principle,) we may refer them to two publications in which it is exposed in all its intellectual absurdity and moral deformity. The one the title of which we give below,* by the Rev. J. EVERTACK GILES, of Leeds, is a very masterly analysis and extensive refutation of the licentious system, as propounded by HENRY OWEN and his fellows or followers. It was originally prepared to be delivered as a popular lecture, but is much too valuable to be considered as a production of ephemeral interest. Mr. GILES has been at the pains of wading through Mr. OWEN's principal publications; and his account of the impious and licentious doctrines which they contain, are supported by references at the foot of the page to the passages in which they occur. Mr. GILES entered upon the disgusting task with a prepossession that they would be found to be "the productions of a mind somewhat sceptical and visionary, yet incapable of a malignant hatred to religion, and by no means unfriendly to good morals." The perusal soon undeceived him; and awakened his detestation of the depravity betrayed in the wickedness and mischievous tendency of the theory. Charged by the Socialists with having misrepresented their sentiments, he has since repeatedly reviewed their system; but in each examination has only strengthened his impressions of its unqualified wickedness. The points are under no small obligations to Mr. GILES for the self-denying toil by which he has rendered himself competent to present this full-length picture of "Socialism" in all its hideous characterisation; and his account will probably serve permanently as the best analysis of the system. At the same time, the powerful reasoning in the pamphlet is adapted to satisfy any persons open to conviction, who may be in danger of being misled by the specious sophistry of the would-be philosopher, and to reinforce the better principles of any untaught mind. The extreme cheapness of the publication will, we hope, facilitate its wide circulation.

The other publication† (already in the second edition) is of a less elaborate, but popular character; and its circulation has been, we are happy to find, attended with the best results at Bliston, the town in which the Author resides. Socialists there, we are told, "if now left to itself, is likely to die a natural death." Yet the progress of the system there appeared at one time so threatening as to excite the fears of all classes; and it was gaining such a hold on the minds of the ignorant and uninformed, as to cause the "Social Missionary" (alias the apostle of Socialism) to report to his friends, "Bliston is all our own." Bliston is a township containing upwards of 12,000 souls. The above statement is important, as indicating that the "mushroom growth" of error of this portentous kind is often fostered by an apoplexy of day. In another part of Staffordshire, the Pottery district, Socialism made its appearance, but, happily, not finding a neglected and vicious population to work upon, and being "left to itself," it speedily shrunk into obscurity. The Rev. Mr. BICKERSTETH, in a recent tract, "On the Dangers of the Church of Christ," represents the progress of Socialism as rapid among the middle and lower classes. We can scarcely believe that the middle classes have been infected by it to any extent. Many persons, he says, "are little aware of the rapidity of the rise and spread of this evil spirit in our own land. Associations are formed at thirty-one of the principal towns in different parts of the country by it, and valuated missionaries are sent to all parts of the land. They have periodical publications and a great number of abominable tracts. There is hardly a large town which the infidel missionaries do not visit; but the towns enumerated have regular Associations, with what they pompously call charters." Without questioning the accuracy of this statement, we should be glad to know upon what data it rests. As Bliston is not named among the thirty-one places, nor Wolverhampton, the enumeration is at all events imperfect. As to the persons who compose these Societies, Mr. MATTHEW says, "It is notorious that the great bulk of them are young men and women, who are seduced by the pleasures and amusements which are there held out to them; and the remainder consist either of persons of bad moral character, or men of untaught religious views, or atheists, unbelievers, Swedenborgians, the followers of JOHANNES SMITH, &c." Among those who have joined them, mention is made, however, of "a clever lecturer, who was once a Baptist Missionary," but is now of "most abominable character of another propagator," who was once a local preacher among the Methodists, and of a third, who had belonged to the same body. But in each of these cases, and scarcely without an exception in all similar ones, the apostates have been persons whose practice did not accord with their Christian profession. It is inconceivable, indeed, that so clumsy and gross a system should present attractions to any individual, not interested in feeling a speculative apology for practical infidelity, or philosophising in defence of his secret libertinism. We do not wish to underestimate either the extent to which these soul-destroying doctrines have spread, or the social danger arising from their prevalence, especially when connected with the political dogmas of the Chartists. Still, our present impression is, that the infernal zeal and diligence with which their Missionaries have been seeking to gain converts to Socialism, have not been so successful as to afford much ground of alarm, though abundant matter for melancholy reflections. Like the cholera, this moral pest may have traversed the length and breadth of the country, making fearful ravages in some localities, but without becoming permanently endemic any where, so that it soon spends itself and disappears. We do not say that it is better in all cases to leave it to itself, for such judicious efforts as those of Mr. GILES and Mr. MATTHEW must be useful in checking its progress, and in shaming its advocates into silence. We are pleased too to be announced, a new cheap periodical, entitled "The Beacon," and edited by one of the most pleasing writers of the day, the Rev. CHARLES B. TATLER, now Rector of St. Peter's, Chester; which has been undertaken, we are told, "on purpose to meet, with God's help, the profane and daring impiety of the Owenites and other infidels of the present times. Every well-intended effort of this description deserves public encouragement. From a glance at the only Number that has reached us, we should say that there is rather a preponderance of the imaginative in the shape of fictitious narrative, and that, to meet infidelity, articles of a more argumentative and informing character must form a prominent feature of the publication. Truth should be presented with its proper evidence.—Pat.

EARTHQUAKES, Feb. 6.—At the Geological Society, a paper, on 'A probable cause of certain Earthquakes,' by M. Louis Albert Necker, was read. Mr. Necker is of opinion, that the falling down of the roof of caverns, made by the solvent or sive powers of a underground bodies of water, may account for some of these earthquakes which have no apparent connexion with volcanic action. The effects, he conceives, may be in part produced by the blow of the detached mass on the subjacent solid strata, and partly by vibrations in the air, contained in the cavern. He mentioned, on the authority of M. Viret, an instance of a shock, similar to that of an earthquake, felt in a coal mine, by the giving way of some subterranean works, at the distance of a quarter of a league. He also noticed instances of effects exhibited on the surface of the ground, by the sinking in of ancient mines; and has expressed a wish, that records of such events should be preserved and published, for the sake of comparison with other phenomena. Mr. Necker referred to several printed lists of earthquakes, and showed that some of them were felt in districts, which, on account of their geological structure, may contain vast energies. Among the documents of this nature, he included that of M. Rion. On comparing the dates of the shocks experienced near Nice with those of renewed energy in Etna and Vesuvius, he found that some of the earthquakes preceded by very short intervals powerful eruptions; but that in a great many instances they appear to have been quite independent of volcanic action, and that a considerable number of periods of activity both in Etna and Vesuvius had no effect on the country around Nice. He, therefore, thinks it is not improbable that that town may be placed within the influence of Etna and Vesuvius, and may have experienced earthquakes due to volcanic operations, but that standing on deposits which may contain caverns, many of the shocks may have resulted simply from internal subsidences; he is further of opinion, that some of them may have proceeded from an union of the two causes, the undrained surface having rendered perceptible slight volcanic operations, which would not otherwise have been felt. M. Necker, from these and numerous similar data, concludes, that there are three classes of earthquakes; one due to subsidence in the earth, another in volcanic action, and a third to the union of the other two—Athenaeum.

THE NEW MAGISTRATE ACT.—The Editor of the Harkara, in his remarks on our article respecting the proposed Magistrate Act, expresses a hope that we will record him in keeping the subject before the public. Considering the narrow point to which the discussion has been contracted, this task is one of no ordinary difficulty. The Editor states, at the conclusion of his observations, that "it is too, most germane to the question, whether the Cooly has an indefeasible right to the time honoured institution of a jury; rather we should say, it is the question itself; for if we admit the legality of an arbitrary power, we deny the right. We suppose that the Friend of India will admit that the larcenous Cooly is a subject. We prefer that word in his most important proposition; "has the subject an indefeasible right to the time honoured institution of a jury." We answer, Yes! indefeasible by any power but the three estates of the realm." The only point at issue, therefore, between us, is, whether the Cooly of Calcutta, as being a subject, has an indefeasible right to the time honoured institution of a jury. With every respect for the authority of our contemporary, we must use the freedom of withholding our assent from his doctrine. If, from the mere circumstance of his being a subject, the cooly has acquired this indefeasible right, then have all the ninety millions of the Native subjects of the Crown in India, the same right; and it is no less nefarious to have so long deprived them of this right, than it is to deprive the Native subjects of Calcutta of it by the proposed enactment. But it is a fact, that this indefeasible right the wretched subjects have never enjoyed, and never claimed; and it is equally a fact that the withholding of this right from a tenth of the human race has never been brought forward against Government by those whose not backward in censuring its measures. Are we not justified, then in concluding, that the Native subjects of the Crown possess no such indefeasible right; that the trial by jury which is called the birth-right of Englishmen, is not the birth-right of the Native; that the right was given to a limited number, and confined to a limited circle, by the free will and mere sanction of the British Parliament; that it was given for benevolent purposes, and that if it appear that greater benefit to the prisoner would accrue from the abrogation of it, it may be taken away from the same motive, and by the same power, by which it was conferred? Whether it can be taken away by any power short of the three estates of Parliament, is a question which depends on another question, viz. with what degree of authority over the arrangements made by Parliament, the Local Legislature has been invested, and this question can be determined only by Parliament itself.

The Editor states that the charges he brought against us of having treated the subject with levity of style, and of having spoken with contempt of the lower orders, remains intact, though we brought forward pregnant examples from the columns of our contemporary, to show that he had used much stronger language on this subject than we had. We, of course, admit, that if there was any impropriety in our language, it was no justification of our conduct to show that the Harkara had used language still more improper. But we deny that the language used either by our contemporary or by us, was in the smallest degree improper. We did not speak in terms of unbecoming levity of a grave subject. We both treated a subject in itself pre-eminently ludicrous, in the language of ridicule; neither was our language stronger than the occasion required. If the Editor is prepared to deny that the trial of a larcenous Cooly with all the pomp and circumstances of the Supreme Court, for purloining a lota, was not a subject fit for the pencil of Hogarth, then may he charge us and himself with undue levity. Still we are unfounded in the charge, that either the Harkara or we, in our description of this legal farce, treated the lower orders with contempt. So far was this from being the case, that the predominating motive which led both the Harkara and us to advocate the removal of these cases from the Supreme Court, was benevolence; benevolence to the Judges and the Jury, but, above all, benevolence to the poor culprit. If either the Harkara or we had supposed that the change of jurisdiction would have been an act of injustice to the larcenous Cooly, or that it would not have been an act of Christian benevolence, we never should have dreamt of advocating it.

To our correspondent X, we beg to say, that though we have not the Statutes at hand to consult, we are certain he will find, that the scale of duties, which the Legislative Council modified and increased, was one which had been settled by Act of Parliament. We are not so bold as to affirm that the Council possess the disposing power they have assumed; but we say that they have exercised it far more openly, extensively, and with impunity. Would not our correspondent draw the same inference from this course of procedure which we do?

The document he alludes to, is not to be found in the Calcutta Gazette, of Dec 30, 1837.

INSURRECTION AT POONAH.—The accounts received from Bombay last week, state that a conspiracy had been discovered at Poonah, to murder all the Europeans there, and to restore the Maratta Government. The timely discovery of it, and the energetic measures adopted by the public authorities, appear to have disconcerted the plans of the conspirators, and restored security. The insubordinate spirit, of which so many indications have lately been exhibited in various parts of the country, naturally leads to reflections on the character of our rule. Sir John Malcolm affirmed, as one of our correspondents stated last week, that there never had been a period in the history of British India, in which there had not existed, more or less, of a conspiracy against us.

When public opinion, usually, and our government stands without opposition, this feeling is smothered; but when the political horizon is darkened, and there appears a distant hope that the subversion of our authority may not be impracticable, it breaks forth in acts of unequivocal resistance. But, however tranquil the surface may appear, there is always an under current of opposition to our supremacy. From the moment when we raised our standard in India, and commenced our career of dominion, we might naturally calculate on the inextinguishable hate of those whom we deprived of all political importance. We have placed the grand prizes of human ambition totally beyond their grasp, and reduced them all to one common level of insignificance; and it would be idle after this to look for any feelings of gratitude, or even of complacency. Their hostility is irrespective of the character of our administration; it is based on the simple fact of its existence, and of the consequent exclusion of ambitious Natives from those commanding stations they enjoyed under the former regime. If our Government had been mild, beyond all example, in its scheme of taxation; equitable above praise, in its administration of justice; if it had been conducted upon the noblest principles of national regeneration, this would have formed no recommendation in the eyes of disappointed ambition, and would have produced no mitigation of the bitterness of its feelings. On the contrary, it is not improbable that the virtues of our government would have exasperated those feelings; and that the more popular our administration was rendered in the eyes of the middling and lower classes by its mildness and equity, the more unpopular would it be with the higher classes; partly because this would have been a prelude to its stability, and partly because it would have tended to separate more widely the interests of the two orders of society. It is true that we have treated the conquered with a degree of deference and generosity, of which society in Asia has never before had an example; but this has only gilded the pill which they have been obliged to take, without mitigating its bitterness. Even our condescension towards those from whom we have wrested the sceptre of power, carries with it the remembrance of former consequence, and the consciousness of present inferiority, which can scarcely fail to irritate the mind. These feelings we cannot hope to eradicate; in fact, the Natives would be less than men, if they did not bitterly feel a change of administration which has destroyed those golden prospects of power and consideration, which the human mind cherishes with such eagerness in every stage of society. Their feelings must be left to the progress of natural decay. The remembrance of former independence will gradually become more faint, and the Native mind be recruited to the prospects afforded by our administration. Since the days of Lord W. Bentinck, a strenuous effort has been made to diminish the interval which separates the conquerors from the conquered, and to associate the Natives with us in the higher responsibilities of authority; and there can be little doubt, that in the lapse of time, as the sphere of ambition is enlarged to the Natives, the inextinguishable aspirations of their minds after distinction, will be associated with the stability of our empire; and not, as at present, with the prospect of its subversion.

STATISTICS OF CRIME IN BENGAL.—However revolting the inquiry into the character and extent of national crime may be, its importance cannot be questioned. Without it we should legislate in the dark, and carry our laws into effect without knowing whether the execution of them was doing good or harm. We suppose our rulers are sufficiently enlightened of so plain a truth as to keep before them the returns of their judicial officers, and have them comparatively thrown into a comprehensive table, by which the social condition of every part of India may, at least, be guessed at. Otherwise, it is not easy to see how they can be properly aware of the exigencies of the community, or have it in their power to remedy them. But whether they enjoy this advantage or not, the economy of our Government denies it not only to the public, but even to the officers of the Courts. As our Councils have but little to occupy their leisure with, might it not be advantageous to invest them with the character of a Committee of Enquiry, in order that they might select from the mass of official documents, which are poured into the bureaux of the Secretaries and Registrars, such of them as it would be advantageous to the State to have generally made known, either in whole or in abstract, and might prepare them for publication? It would certainly be the means of engaging many minds in the examination of important points, respecting which the benefit of their intelligence is now lost.

In the meantime, we will use our best endeavours to obtain as much information as we can, on the subject with which we began, the state of crime in India. In the Appendix to the Report of the Committee on Prison Discipline, we find statements by the Magistrates of Baruaet, the 24 Pargunnas, Hooghly, Bardwan, Jessore, Naddea, and Midnapore, of the convicted prisoners in custody in those districts in the month of December, 1836, which appear to us to be of great value. As, however, the statements are given separately, and without any attempt at uniformity in their details, they neither afford an easy comparison of the several districts in respect of crime, nor a distinct view of the aggregate amount of crime in the portion of Bengal which they embrace. We have, therefore, thrown the whole of these statements into one table, and have added the population of the different Zillahs, as it was estimated by Mr. Adam in his Education Report, at the time to which the returns of the Magistrates refer. Our table will afford materials of thought to every intelligent reader: and we trust its uses will be so manifest that our friends in all parts of the country will be stimulated to send us more ample returns, from which we may compile something far better, and therefore more useful.

In judging from this table of the state of crime in this part of Bengal, it is to be remembered, that all criminals doomed to capital punishment and banishment, and, we believe, the most of those sentenced to imprisonment for life, are omitted. The table does not, therefore, exhibit the full extent of crime, and especially of its most aggravated forms. Neither do the crimes specified appear always to reach the same thing. Thus the returns of murder in Bardwan amount to the enormous number of 80; but there are not so many perpetrators of distinct murders, for there are between twenty and thirty of them apparently grouped in one condemnation. The fact is, we imagine, that under this head are reckoned in Bardwan, a number of cases, which, in other districts, would have been returned as affrays with murder. Similar discrepancies will be found in respect of other offences.

In considering this subject, there are two inquiries to be prosecuted, of prime importance. To what causes are the prominent crimes to be attributed, and how, therefore, may they be abated or prevented? And what are the crimes known to exist extensively, and injuriously to the public welfare, which our system of jurisprudence is unable to lay hold of and subdue? At present we shall simply leave these questions to the consideration of our readers. They are of grave importance.

SOT-DISANT PERTAUB CHAND.—The trial of the pretended Pertaub Chand having now been brought to a close by the decision of the Court of Final Appeal, the press is at liberty to offer its opinion without impropriety; and we proceed to exercise a privilege, of which our contemporaries have freely availed themselves. We think the fact of his being an imposter has been established by the most irrefragable testimony; indeed, we have seldom seen a larger or more decisive body of evidence brought forward in the establishment of a fact, than on the present occasion; and seldom has a prisoner possessed a fairer opportunity for sustaining his case in the Native Courts. He enjoyed, above all, the pre-eminent benefit of having his cause conducted by two barristers of great legal requirements and talent. In his petition for a new trial, the only substantial objection which he brings against the trial at Hooghly, appears to lie in the fact, that the witnesses summoned on his behalf, were not bound to stand under the same sanctions as those summoned by the prosecution. How far this was the case, or how far it operated to the exclusion of material evidence, we have no means of knowing, except from his allegation; but as far as it is true, it is greatly to be deprecated.

The evidence which was adduced on both sides from ancient recollection as to his identity with Pertaub Chand, must, we think, have appeared to all, as the least important portion of the testimony; and as having needlessly encumbered the case. A certain number of persons swore, to the best of their recollection, that he was the Pertaub Chand whom they had known twenty years ago; and others swore, on the other hand, that he was not. No man saw, we think, trust to his recollection of a countenance at the distance of eighteen or twenty years. In the case of Natives, in whose features the change induced by time is greater than in the case of Europeans, any evidence drawn from such remembrance must be extremely fallacious. In regard to the prisoner, moreover, who having lived in ease and affluence for thirty years, passed, as he says, twelve years amidst the hardships of a wandering and ascetic life, the change of features must have been such as to stagger the recollections of those who were best acquainted with him. To the great body of evidence relative to the death and cremation of the real Pertaub Chand, and which constituted the real strength of the prosecution, no contradiction whatever was offered. It remained totally unrefuted that Pertaub Chand died in the presence of many individuals, and was burned in the presence of thousands in a position in which it was impossible for him to have escaped from the pile, without observation. The very improbable story of his escape was not substantiated by a title of proof; neither did he attempt to explain the incredibility of his forsaking such possessions as he then enjoyed, without leaving a single memorandum, which might substantiate his claims on his return. If the strong body of evidence brought forward against him, had been shaken in the smallest degree, his case would have assumed a different character. It was said at the time, that he voluntarily withheld some very material evidence, in order not to lay open the whole of his case, to the insinuations of his opponents, who might, with the clue afforded them, have taken steps to defeat his suit for the recovery of the estates. If he was really in possession of evidence of a more satisfactory character, it was highly injudicious in him to have so carefully concealed it from the Judges who were to decide upon the great question of his identity, in a criminal suit; which decision, if given against him, could not fail to prejudice his interests in the civil suit he proposed to institute. Whether the Nizamut Court will grant a new trial, must rest with the Judges; but of this we are certain, that the decision they have passed accords with the convictions of nine-tenths of the most respectable inhabitants of the country.

As it regards the decision of the Judges, we cannot but consider it a gratuitous assumption, that they were influenced by the wishes of Government. Next to the charge of bribery and corruption, the deepest charge which can be brought against a tribunal, is a perversion of justice by an undue leaning to power. No proof whatever has been adduced to substantiate an accusation, which, if true, would render them unfit for their situations. Such conduct on their part appears, moreover, to be altogether without a motive. The Judges of the Court of Final Appeal in Calcutta are virtually as independent in their position as the Judges of England. They enjoy the highest salaries which the Local Government can bestow, and there is no higher place open to their ambition, but a seat in Council, which is a special gift of the Court of Directors. They have nothing, therefore, to hope from subservience to the executive authorities; neither, indeed, have they any thing to fear from the honest discharge of their duties. Were the Executive authorities to remove them from office for any cause, which might be traced even remotely to the independence of their decisions, such is the present state of affairs, owing to a vigilant and not over-friendly press in this country, and the feeling of interest, if not of mistrust, which is beginning to gain ground at home, relative to our concerns, that the Council Board would be overwhelmed with a storm of indignation. Until, therefore, the charge can be sustained by a reference to substantial facts, or even by the exhibition of adequate motives, we are bound to consider the decision, however adverse to the wishes of some, to be the result of a conscientious and equitable principle.

So far as we have been able to comprehend the character of this case, we are constrained to dissent from the opinion of our contemporaries concerning the expediency of the reference to the Native Law Officer. Two charges were brought in appeal to the Sudder Nizamut Court; the first related to the fact, whether the sot-disant Pertaub Chand was an imposter or not; the second had reference to the riot at Calcutta. Of this latter crime he was found guilty, for want of sufficient evidence; on the other hand, the force of testimony led the Judges to the conclusion, that he was an imposter. The Court is bound to administer criminal justice according to the precepts of Mahomedan law. The Judges, therefore, enquired of the officer appointed to explain that code, whether, in the eye of the Mahomedan law, such an assumption of the name and title of a deceased Zemindar, with the view of obtaining possession of the Estates, was a crime or not. The officer replied, that it was a criminal act; but that the punishment was discretionary, and was to be apportioned according to the circumstances of the case. This appears to be the plain unvarnished version of the transaction. The precept of the Law Officer may possibly be open to ridicule; but the absurdity consists primarily in the adoption of the Mahomedan code; and we cordially join our contemporaries in beseeching Government to relieve the administration of justice from the possible recurrence of such absurdities in future. But under existing circumstances, the Judges had to choose between the absurdity of putting such a case, as the illegality of deciding without putting it, and they wisely preferred the former course. There can be little doubt, that the case laid before the Law Officer, and his reply, would furnish a rich field of ridicule to the Examiner. Fontblanque is familiar with legal absurdities from his long habit of noting the proceedings in Westminster Hall; and he would find no difficulty in applying to the present case the same caustic wit and withering satire which he has so long been in the habit of dealing out to the diets of English Lawyers.

The translation of the query and the precept, appears to have been made by some novice unacquainted with the genius either of the Native or the English language. It is any thing but correct. Were any decrees of the Supreme Court to be put into Bengalee, Oordoo, or Persian, upon the same principle of translation, the risible faculties of the Natives would be as much excited as those of our contemporaries have been. The translation given in the Commercial Advertiser is said to be much more correct.

RETIRING FUNDS.—We put it to the Editorial experience of the Harkaw, whether the course pursued in his Journal of Friday last, in ascribing to us the sentiments of our correspondent on the subject of Retiring Funds, be not subversive of that courtesy which we owe each other, and calculated to lead to great inconveniences. If an Editor displays any impartiality towards his correspondents, and allows his paper to become the arena for that free and unfettered discussion, which is the shortest road to truth, he will often find one column at open war with that which runs parallel to it; and if he is to be identified with his correspondents, there will not only be no Editorial fixity of character, but even on the same day, and in the same paper he will be found to turn his back on himself and to advocate the most opposite sentiments. Some weeks ago a correspondent sent us two letters against gambling; the one polluted at racing, and similar vices; the other, against Retiring Funds, which he indulged in one common censure, under the general term of gambling. Agreeing, as we did, with his first letter; dissenting entirely from his second, we published both without note or comment. The Harkaw, in his article, would have on the minds of his readers an impression, that the opinions on Retiring Funds was our own. We beg him to correct the mistake by giving this notice a corner in his broad sheet. The opinion was that of our correspondent; with whose name we are not acquainted, but who is evidently a good man, with some crooked notions.

ENGLAND: THE SOCIETY SYSTEM.—The history of our great Societies, brief as it is, affords numerous exemplifications of the folly of man's conceit, respecting the infinite importance of perpetuating his modes of doing good. Full of complacency in the system which his invention has originated, or his zeal made effective, and losing sight of its end in the admiration of its construction and symmetry, he is ever apt to think that every thing is secured for the future, when provision has been made for the perpetuation of a mere form and routine. It is forgotten that knowledge, morals, piety—all things in fact that are good—are essential. They propagate themselves; and in no other way are they propagated. Hence, the only way of making sure they shall increase in succeeding times, is to labour for their increase now. If, in any region, the present thousands of devoted, spiritually-minded Christians, could be raised to millions, we should have realized the best possible security that the next generation would be more thoroughly Christian than our own. Not that the security would be infallible; but there is no other equal to it, or to be compared with it. Yet, in contradiction to this certain truth, we find men constantly clamouring for prescription in favour of some scheme of their idolatry; and for pecuniary endowments to secure its unmodified and unrestricted application, as both essential to the continuance of knowledge and religion in the world.

It is the glory of our great Societies, that they originated in a noble burst of Christian philanthropy, that could no longer be repressed and confined by the ceremonies of lifeless formality. The men whose minds were the most powerfully affected by the newly awakened spirit of holy zeal, naturally took the lead in their formation; and the prime individuals even of them were called to occupy their responsible and active offices. Their Secretaries were of the giants of those days. Such names as Fuller, Burdett, Pratt, Hughes, Owen and Steinkopf will stand out in bold relief, in the records of the Christian Church, to the end of time. There was great inequality in their intellectual powers; but in largeness of heart, in fervency of benevolence, in energy and singleness of purpose they all towered high above the ordinary stature of men. To speak to such men of sinking into the salaried servitude of great corporations, whose stately dignity was impaired by accepting of services for which they did not pay in cash, was to break their hearts. If they acquiesced in the principle, they could not endure its personal application. But on this principle all their successors have been appointed. Respectability of talent, and weight of character, forsooth, have been secured by an adequate bonus in the shape of a genteel stipend. And without a thought of depreciating the present race of Secretaries, we would yet confidently ask, which of the great men we have named has found a successor worthy of him? In fact such are the evil concomitants of the Society system, that in choosing Secretaries of the second generation it has been found necessary to give the preference to the candidates of the lowest pretensions. Repented have men of no mark—of mere useful, working ability—been elected in preference to others of loftier character, for the simple reason that mankind was not to be given to one party, nor preponderance to another, by calling to offices of trust and power, men whose endowments and reputation were such as to confer honour and influence upon the party to which they belonged. In this way a respectable mediocrity has become the most powerful recommendation, in a candidate for a Secretaryship; and thus it is that a perpetuated, and even an extended combination of means for the promotion of religion is not only susceptible of decay and failure, but carries a principle of quick decay within itself. The same secular interferences which impair the workings of the machine, affect in time the whole of its construction.

Perhaps there is no greater evil connected with the Societies than the incubus like power which they have acquired over our religious communities. The individuals who obtain the sway in their Committees are generally men whose personal character is respectable; and many of them are entitled to the highest estimation. In the infinite ramifications of the Societies, they become universally known. On errands of religious interest they are continually visiting every nook and corner of the land; and thereby they come to know every body, and all their affairs, to have information to give from all quarters, and to be considered the best advisers on all matters relating to the progress of the Gospel. They curiously blend or interchange the supple humiliation of applicants for charity, with the conscious importance of men who have, at least, as much to spend as they have had to beg; and it is a wonderfully elevating thing for people, otherwise in but a small way, to have a hand in dealing out, for whatever purpose, twenty, thirty, or fifty thousand pounds a year. Now the active members of the Committee of one Society are soon introduced into the Committee of many others. Were we to take fifty of the Committees of London, consisting of twenty-five members each, instead of finding they had enlisted twelve hundred and fifty individuals in the service of piety and benevolence, we should, probably, discover that the same men were so shuffed about, that not above half that number were required. And if we prosecuted the inquiry farther, it would be seen, that in each Committee there are not above five or six really working men, who are in fact the originators and ex-ecutors of all that the Societism design and accomplish. But these men of activity are, in proportion, still more mingled up than the Committee-men generally. Instead of two hundred and fifty, or even a hundred and twenty-five of them being found to bear the burden, it is more probable that not many more than fifty individuals will be doing all that the fifty Committees have to do. Thus a mere fraction of the Christians of the metropolis become, in a great measure, the directors of the pious efforts of the three kingdoms; and the same men being repeatedly placed together in multiplied combinations, they work themselves into a singular uniformity of conception, a methodical system of Society politics. Any intruding innovator on the received notions is very soon driven from the herd. Conquing down is a manner by no means peculiar to the House of Commons; at least its counterpart will be found in the region of the Societies.

A little consideration will shew that this metropolitan oligarchy have means at their command, which make them truly formidable. Nearly every individual of them may be a Director or Committee-man of a Bible Society, a Tract Society, a Foreign Missionary Society, a Home Missionary Society, a City Missionary Society, a General School Society, as the British and Foreign School, or National School Society, or Sunday School Union, a Church or Chapel-building Society, a College or an Academy, half a dozen Charity Schools for orphans of various classes, as many funds for poor ministers, minister's widows, or Theological Students at the Scotch Universities, and to crown all, be at the same time a proprietor or manager of a denominational magazine. An individual who has a share in so complicated a system of patronage, of buying and selling, of charity dispensing and of writing for the controul of public intelligence and opinion, is in a situation dangerous to himself and others; and when the whole economy is worked by a confederated junta, upon common principles, and with a strong understanding of the necessity of maintaining unity through the whole, the result is as we have hinted, that an incubus of metropolitan assumption and narrow-mindedness represses the energy of the whole country. Wherever there are ministers desirous of changing their situation, or receiving a charitable addition to a narrow income, or introducing a pious young friend into the ministry, or a child into a public school, or a poor widow to a pension; wherever a congregation is in want of a minister, or of help in building a place of worship, or a school; or in fact, wherever there is any thing of religious interest going forward, recourse to the metropolis is unavoidable; and the knowledge that it is, creates a subservience to metropolitan influence which is pernicious to the last degree. The evil, indeed, has become so great, that it cannot be borne much longer: and hereafter we shall endeavour to shew how it begins to totter to its fall.

COAL.—The following observations on the use of the Palomow Anthracite Coal in our River Steamers have been sent us by a Correspondent. We can conceive of no reason of any force that can be brought against it; and the economy it would secure, is immense. * The Bardwan Coal, it appears, costs 12 annas the second at Dinapore; and the contractors to furnish it at that rate say they have a losing speculation. But our Correspondent shews that the Palomow Coal may be brought to that station at 8 annas: and we have heard that the Commissioner of Patna has been proposed to supply it at 6 annas. Omitting the consideration, therefore, of the more effective qualities of the Palomow Coal, it is evident it might be brought to Dinapore, in equal quantities with that from Bardwan, at a deduction of about one-third, if not one-half the cost. Of course a proportionate economy would be gained on the coal used on the river all the way from Dinapore to Allahabad, and not much less on the supply for Rajmahl, which could be sent from Dinapore at a very trifling expense. Of the supply for stations still lower down we shall speak anon. In the mean time we give the remarks of our Correspondent on the subject.

"As a public measure, and one in which the Government are deeply interested, for supplying their steamers proceeding to the Upper Provinces, it would seem strange that its value has not yet been sufficiently estimated, although we have, in letters lately received, been given to understand, that it is intended to make trial of a considerable quantity of that Coal, and that a gentleman has been deputed from Dinapore to conduct the operations. It is clear from the report, that no one can undertake it as an adventure, as the likelihood of profit is forbidden by the present impracticability of there being any consumption beyond that by the river steamers. We have heard it said, that barring the expense of a Superintendent, the cost of landing that Coal at Dinapore within a year after the first opening of the mines, and when matters shall have been steadily established, would not amount to more than 7 to 8 annas per maund. The character of the Palomow Coal, is different from that at present in use. It is stone Coal, we believe anthracite; but it is said that the present furnaces of the Iron steamers are sufficiently well constructed, and have draft enough to ensure its combustion. Moreover, we are now daily receiving accession to our accounts of the progress made in devising means for the consumption of anthracite, both in the English and the American steamers; and if success has attended those trials, what should prevent its adoption here, provided always that its economy points it out as desirable. The agitation now going forward to England, respecting a river steam navigation, may by a further inducement to bring this matter to trial upon a large scale.

The quantity formerly brought to Calcutta, was insufficient for it, although by the small trials made, it puts forth a strong claim to have them extended. In brief, we understand, far exceeded that of other Coal—and the residuum did not exceed that now used in the Steamers. The Mint Master, Mr. Prinsep, furnished an analysis; and it seems to us that it possesses those desirable properties which other anthracites do. In late trials made upon the Liverpool rail road it elicited a report from the Engineer to the following effect:—

"In the first instance the Engine ran out with a load about six miles, without any difficulty being experienced either with the tubes or in getting up the fire. The Engine brought back a load of Coal waggons, and acquired a speed thus hailed of 21 miles per hour. Another trial was made in the evening with the same Engine, for the whole distance to Manchester, taking five loaded waggons, this journey was performed in one hour and twenty-one minutes; the consumption of anthracite was only 3½ cwt. although a large portion was wasted from the fire bars being too wide apart for the economical use of this fuel. The Engines would have used 7½ cwt. of coke for the same journey, with the same load. The application of anthracite to the marine Engines is the next object most deserving the attention of practical men."

"The only reason at present that exists against its immediate adoption, is the required alteration in the construction of the boilers. In its application to marine purposes, there is the important consideration that by the 50 per cent. additional carbon it contains, storage is proportionably saved.

"Again, in the United States, we have the following very interesting account of a trial made, and its gratifying result.

"The recent successful experiment of driving the new steam boat 'Novelly,' of the largest class, with anthracite coal, against the tide, and a strong current at the rate of 16 miles in the hour, has excited much remark in our city, as an astonishing feat of great import once on the subject of fuel, which must lead to revolutions in steam navigation. In the trips to Albany for one season, the difference in cost, between wood and anthracite for the 'Novelly' alone, is ascertained, would be 19,000 dollars in favour of Coal.

"Now it must be evident that these facts, recorded by highly-qualified persons, are sufficiently strong to warrant us to anticipate similar results from the Coal in the Palamow field; and it appears to be most desirable that Government should take the matter in hand, and afford the fullest opportunity for determining its effects on their own steamers.

"We have heard that the contract for supplying the upper division of the river, from Dinapore to Allahabad, has been a losing one to the last parties; and although the prices have been as high as an average of 12 annas per maund; yet if this Palamow Coal only can be brought fairly down to Dinapore, it might not, within another year, to cost more than about 8 annas; and considering that even it will be then so much lower than the present cost of Coal, it will still have another and stronger recommendation in its favor by the fact of its containing so very much more carbon than the present Barwan Coal—full 25 per cent.; and consequently should a weight of Coal such as is now laden in the steamers be taken on board, they would require a less number of Coal Depots than they now do, in as much as the present given weight of Coals would drive the steamers a much greater distance; or should the same depots be continued, a less quantity of Coal embarked at each of them would leave so much more tonnage available for public purposes, which of late has been seen to be required to the exclusion of all private freight.

"Our next point for consideration, as regards this Palamow Coal, is the possibility of the present furnaces in the river steamers being able to burn anthracite; and we are pretty certain, that the present grates and boiler flues are well constructed, and that there will be found a sufficiency of draft to ensure its perfect ignition. Now in aid of it we have on record, amongst other modes proposed, one which has placed the matter beyond doubt. It must, however, require some little modification, and that but little. It has been long known that to prevent the issue of the dark dense mass of smoke from the Brewery Furnaces, that a small jet of steam thrown up the flues, destroyed the smoke, or, in other words, the smoke was, after this adoption, scarcely visible; but in later trials it has been adapted to increase the draft of the flues so as to destroy the smoke—and in the trials which were lately made at Edinburgh by a committee delegated from a Scientific Association it appears, that the result is that the consumption of fuel is most materially decreased.

"1 lb. of ordinary Coal drives off in steam 14 lbs. of water, but this is much more than pretties warrants, which seldom exceeds 3 to 4 lbs. of water; but with a jet of steam introduced within the furnace, the result is as high as 13 lbs. of water evaporated by 1 lb. of ordinary Coal. This mode of using Coal is now secured by a patent to Mr. Iveland, one of the proprietors of Castle silk mills, where two principal Engines of 70 H. power each, and 1 of 10 H. power are at work, and where the Committee witnessed the recorded result of their investigation, which was that in 6 hours' experiment, 392 lbs. of Coal had evaporated 5,040 lbs. of water or 12,884 lbs. to 1 lb. of fuel proving an increase of steam equal to 113 per cent. by this process; and could a result even of a fourth of this successful mode of raising steam at an considerable a reduction of Coal be introduced here, the results to inland steam navigation will be most important. I am aware how objectionable the use of high pressure steam is in this country, but it is not necessary in this case, although in America and on the Liverpool rail-road it has been employed to such manifest advantage. Steam of 7 lbs. pressure will admit of this process; and this improvement under Iveland's patent will, under certain circumstances, accomplish all that seems to be wanting."

But now may we ask what the Coal Committee have done in the discharge of their duty? It does not appear that their inquiries have brought us coal from a single new mine in any quarter, or procured an cheaper supplies at any one station. The great drawback from the benefits of inland steam navigation, in the extravagant cost of fuel, remains as it was. Yet there is every reason to believe, that this can be overcome by nothing but experiments somewhere—if not in the Committee, in those by whom alone effect can be given to the Committee's recommendations. We have already seen, that there is every prospect of the Palamow coal-field supplying the whole demand from Rajmahl to Allahabad, at a very great reduction of expense, if means were but once afforded to open the communication. Why do Government hesitate to place any sum that may be requisite, at the disposal of the Commissioner of Patna, for establishing an effective depot at Dinapore? If once established, it might be well to relinquish it to private merchants; but as no private person appears to have inclination and capital for the undertaking, let the first risk, if risk there be, be borne by the State, which will be the first to benefit by its success.

But again we have heard, on the best authority, that all who are capable of judging of the facilities of the Cherra Coal, and the rivers by which it would be conveyed, are of opinion, that it might be delivered at Sarda for 50 Rs. the 100 maunds, instead of 70 Rs. the price now paid for the Barwan Coal; and Commercially and Kalna might be supplied from the same source with equal advantage. Thus, between Cherra and Palamow, an immense reduction of expense might be gained on the whole course of the river voyage. The establishment of a Cherra Coal depot at Sylhet, has, indeed, been talked of: we have even heard that a former Collector of that district was authorized to make the necessary expenditure for the purpose; but in a change of officers the proposition has fallen to the ground. And instead of this common sense measure, advertisements are issued for contracts for bringing Cherra Coal to Calcutta, the only place where it is not wanted. A ship load may as well be sent to try the market at Newcastle.

Last of all, the public are aware, from the papers published in the Journal of the Asiatic Society, that enough has been ascertained respecting Coal-fields in Assam, to have warranted the thorough investigation of them, and of the means of drawing out their supplies. But now it appears, when the Government desires to send troops to this important frontier province, and would secure promptitude for its measures, as well as comfort and safety to its military, by the use of steam conveyance, none of the Coal of the province is yet available for the purpose; but before one steamer can set out on the Garo, return business, another must be sent before with fuel for her use. What embarrassment and expense would not have been saved by proper, timely attention to the mineral riches of Assam. We know that nothing could be wanting in Captain Jenkins, to whose care its government is intrusted; but much has been wanting somewhere. Could Dr. McClelland, or any member of the Coal Committee, tell us whether lies the obstruction that has hitherto made all their efforts abortive? Is it private interest, or public negligence?

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 27.

The latest accounts from Rangoon state, that a Native merchant of the name of Shauk Abdoulah had arrived there in a large Burmese vessel from Pondicherry, with a large assortment of warlike stores, purchased for the King, who has rewarded him with a gold chain and a title of nobility. A singular circumstance has recently transpired at Ava. In February last, a respectable Armenian merchant imported 40,000 Rupees worth of scarlet scarfs from Madras, which were found, on being opened, to have been damaged by salt water. The foreign merchants put their heads together to devise the means of disposing of the soiled scarfs. They agreed to go in grand procession to the King, dressed in scarlet scarfs, to congratulate him on his success in having expelled Col. Benson from Ava. On His Majesty's asking them what the scarfs signified; he replied, that they were worn by the deputation as a badge of distinction, to mark their good faith and loyalty. The King was so well pleased with their devotion, that he immediately issued an order that every one of his subjects, in the remotest parts of his dominions, should wear a scarlet scarf, instead of the usual turban. We need scarcely add, that the damaged cargo of scarfs was sold at a high premium before night.—The Parsees at Bombay are represented as having withdrawn all their children from the School of the General Assembly, in consequence of the events which have recently transpired. They have done more. They have issued a prospectus, for the publication, in Gujarati, of a work, in refutation of Christianity, which is to be culled from the productions of the unbelievers in Europe.—The little steamer, the Indus, in her late experimental trip, made trial of the new coal which has been discovered by Major Ouseley, in the vale of the Nerbudda, near Moungabul. The result was highly satisfactory. For every 5 cwt. of the Indian Coal, 6 of the best Scotch Coal were consumed. It is to be hoped, that energetic measures will be adopted by Government to work these mines, and to make them available for the Bombay Steamers.—We stated last week, that the number of children carried off by wolves at Agra, in two months, exceeded a hundred and forty. The last number of the Agra Ushbar exonerates Government from any charge of negligence. The Commissioner, it appears, authorized the Magistrate to expend 100 Rupees a month in destroying these animals, and raised the reward to five Rupees a head.—From the same authority we learn, that the state of Bunjeet Singh is so precarious, that the European Officers were not allowed to visit him, lest they should observe it. His demise will be followed up by the immediate entrance of a British force into the Punjab; at least, so say the public papers.

FRIDAY, JULY 23.

The Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Bombay, who has been instrumental in the conversion of the two Parsee youths, has just published a masterly reply to the animadversions of the Hucknara. We have given it entire in our columns.—Letters from Girkak state, that Brigadier Sale on reaching Girkak, found that all the chieftains had fled to Meshed or Persia. Every thing in Afghanistan appears to wear a smiling appearance, except the condition of the army, as it respects provisions. All opposition had melted away on our approach. The opposition to be expected from Cabul, is not worthy of consideration. Persia has not marched an army to Herat, and cannot do so for want of funds. It is expected that affairs, west of the Indus, will be so far settled by the beginning of the cold season, as to enable Lord Auckland to turn his attention to the attitude which Nepal has assumed, and to call that power to account for the intrigues which it has been fomenting throughout India.—The petition of the poor Christians at Tutocore, to Lord Elinington, is given in the papers of this day.—The Englishman announces to his military readers the gratifying fact, that six additional regiments are to be raised immediately. The mode in which they are to be officered is given in detail by our contemporary.—From the same source we learn, that Col. Stoddart has been for three months a prisoner at Bokhara.

SATURDAY, JULY 23.

The Englishman of this day contradicts the report that six additional regiments are to be raised.—We are informed in the same journal, that Col. Stoddart has been liberated by the Chief of Bokhara, and enjoys more consideration than he did before his incarceration.—The Bombay papers mention that the May Mail may be hourly expected.—A curious case has just been tried at Bombay. Mr. J. P. Larkins brought an action against Mr. F. C. Lewis, for the abduction of his wife. The damages were laid at 50,000 Rupees. Before the commencement of the trial, the counsel for the defendant offered to settle the matter amicably, by consenting in a writ of the damages; which, strange to say, the prosecutor refused. The case had occupied two days when the last Bombay papers came away, but the verdict was deferred.—Government has agreed to allow the Water Witch to carry small packages to the extent of ten tons as far as Aden, and engages that they shall be sent on in the Steamer to Suet, and across the desert to Cairo and Alexandria, freight free.—H. M. S. the Conway, left Calcutta yesterday, in tow of the Enterprise. She goes on to Trincomalee, and takes two lakhs and a half of Rupees to Ceylon, and the same quantity to Malacca.—We regret much to hear that the Local Government, notwithstanding Lord Auckland's favourable minute, has come to a decision regarding the disposal of the Ten Colonies, which must damp the ardour of the enterprising companies who are ready to embark in the enterprise. This will occasion an interruption, but it cannot defeat the projects which have been so energetically supported in England, for giving the benefits of the Tea trade to our own provinces. We suspend our opinion on this decision, till we can see the grounds on which it is formed.—It is stated that the Amerees of Solinde, who agreed to pay down twenty-seven lakhs of Rupees when Sir John Keane's army was ready to attack their capital, have not paid more than seven lakhs of Rupees, and that the argument of British bayonets will be required to enforce the completion of the treaty.

MONDAY, JULY 1.

The trial of the insurgents at Poona has just been completed by Mr. Bell. Of thirty-five who were charged with high treason, nine were acquitted, one died during the trial, and twenty-five were condemned to death. It is to be hoped, however, that Sir James Carnarvon will distinguish the commencement of his reign by an act of mercy.—Two Hundred Natives attended the first Durbar of the Governor at Bombay, and were received by him with distinction. His Honour alluded in the happiest manner to his having been born, and to his having passed the prime of his life in the country he was appointed to rule; and assured them that in every instance they would find the readiest access to him, and meet with a prompt redress of grievances.—In the case of Larkins versus Lewis, for the abduction of his wife, the Judge gave 2,000 Rupees damages; the plaintiff had demanded 50,000.—An envoy from Dost Mahomed Khan has just arrived at the Court of Simkha, with a letter, filled with abuse of the English, and soliciting the assistance of troops. The Maha Rajah sent the envoy under an escort to the British Resident.—Lord Auckland's camp is ordered to be formed on the 1st of October at Kurnal.—The applications for furloughs in the Civil Service, this year, greatly exceed the number which is available. This was the case last year, and several whose expectations of a visit to the hills and dale of merry old England were blighted, were subjected to a cruel disappointment.—No token was visible last week, either of a new loan, or of the addition of another Million to the advances on produce.

TUESDAY, JULY 2.

The papers concur in stating, that orders have at length been received from Lord Auckland directing the appointment of Translators in the Coriolis, Persian and Bengalee languages. Considering that the translators will have the arrears of eighteen months to bring up, they will be objects of pity, unless Government should give them back salary together with back work. Rumour points to one individual as having been selected for the office of Bengalee translator, whose acquaintance with the language is imperfect, and whose appointment will create loud complaints in the Native community.—The Opium sale of yesterday turned out most unexpectedly favourable to Government. No one dreamt that, with the fear of the Commissioner Lin before his eyes, any speculator would venture in offer more than 150; the Benares sold, however, on an average at 300; the Behar at 278 Rs. the chest.—No overland mail as yet.—Letters from Jessore speak more favourably of the Ludigo crop; the accounts from Bhagpore and Kilmnagar are more melancholy. The river which had risen, has subsequently fallen, after having done some injury to the crops; still the season generally promises to be a most abundant one.—We learn that the American Missionaries at Buddiya have determined to remove to Jeypore, the centre of the Tea cultivation.—The Catholics of Calcutta have just established a weekly journal to advocate their cause in the controversy with Protestants. It is called 'The Bengal Catholic Expositor.'

WEDNESDAY, JULY 3.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—In your paper of this day you say, with reference to the power of the local Legislature to repeal an Act of Parliament, that the first occasion on which it was exercised was, "the augmentation of the duties on articles imported from England beyond the Parliamentary scale." You will pardon my freedom in asking you to point out the Act of the Imperial Parliament which has reference to levying duties in any part in India. The only Act, that I know of, which regulates the duties to be levied in the Colonies is the 3 and 4 William 4 chap. 59; and no mention is made therein of India.

The Act of the Legislative Council of India, to which you allude, is the Tariff, No. 14 of 1836; and as you are bold enough to say that the local Legislature possesses the power to dispense with an Act of Parliament, I beg leave to refer you to the Calcutta Government Gazette, of the 30th December, 1887, which contains a Regulation of the Court of Directors framed to meet the illegal clauses of the Tariff Act, as passed by the Government here.

Your obedient servant,

ON THE INITIATING OF TEENAGERS TOWARDS GOOD GOVERNMENT.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—In the following letter I shall not dwell on the evils of our Indian Government, further than is necessary for the understanding of the system of remedy which I undertake to suggest.

Firstly, I have to submit that the people cannot, in the smallest degree, be morally or politically raised; or indeed be susceptible of any beneficial direction from the Government, until the masses (for it is there we must work) have been induced, and even gaily coerced, to acquire the primary essentials of education. This may seem an arduous work; but, in reality, is exactly one of those which fall under Lord Bacon's general observation, that great changes are often more easy than those which are small: any person who can read and write, can, in little more than a year, turn out 500 who can do so also. These are the means; and as in motives, let those who cannot read and write be subjected to coercion, to pull-call or curfew* laws, and let ability of reading and writing be made a condition, of even the lowest service under the Government or the municipal officers.

In the next place; let us, as far as may be, remove whatever most repulses all improving and productive hope and energy. Thus let it be a general (but not quite absolute) rule, that all balances against tyrants of more than one year's standing, be struck off, and that all hereditary responsibility for debts be utterly abrogated; for this last mentioned responsibility operates much more generally than can be imagined, in producing ill-health and despondency among the many members of Indian communities, who are, as the law now stands, born to hopeless insolvency for debts incurred before they were even born.

Further, it is of the utmost importance to pervade all the social system of India with the salutary ambition of public service, instead of the present ambition, which—for want of better, and because of people must have some ambition—wastes itself in the barren and depressive pride of jewellery and extravagant ceremonies and puerilities. Under improved principles of selection, there can be no doubt that selected natives would perform the required duties as well as the unselected Europeans who now perform them; and the efficiency of native functionaries will always be required and insisted on, with more right justice than the efficiency of one of the favoured caste is; it being notorious that nothing, much short of actual idiocy or palpable criminality,† would always induce the Government to relieve a community from the maladministration of a European. Every new official situation made open to natives, is also, besides being an object of improving, hope and ambition to multitudes, an additional root put forth by the Government into the soil of the country; and thus the measure is also one of good constitutional policy.*

Before quitting the subject of presenting such motives of improving ambition and loyalty to the natives, I would urge that the employment of natives does not involve the expenses of College, and of furlough, and of frequent absence on sick certificates, or on leave at the Calcutta races or elsewhere; that the expenses would be about one-fourth, and the pay would all be expended in the country.

While the masses are still allowed to grovel in their present condition of almost brutish ignorance, it might seem absurd to propose that they be intrusted with their own self-government, even in the most trivial and merely local affairs; but it may not be absurd to propose the mere initiation of a tendency to enlightened self-government; and I accordingly would urge, that so soon as the means and motives of primary education, to the masses have been set in motion; then (which ought to be soon) the tendency to self-government in the municipalities, should be initiated; and, firstly, it should (I think) be directed to the object of self-collection of revenue.

And here I would observe, that gradually to substitute collective adjustment for individual coercion of revenue, is an object of primary importance. The native communities could, certainly, with their continual opportunities of scrutiny, more equally apportion the payment among themselves, than this can be done by Europeans; many of whose most approved assessments have (after costing several lakhs of Rupees) been found to require entire reformation: the native communities are, indeed, sometimes so disinclined with the authorised apportionment of details, that (as I well know) they sometimes supersede it by a private apportionment of their own; and this also shows their aptitude to agree in such self-apportionments; and illustrates one of the many instances in which we unduly omit to educe such aptitude as the natives may have for co-operation with the Government. If, instead of covering the fields with an absolute net-work of government functionaries, so that the poor people cannot even adjust their backs to their fiscal burthens, we were gradually to put them on their own capabilities of self-apportionment and collection; it does not seem improbable, that the present totals of taxation would cease to be very oppressive; and further, from these totals, we might deduct the expenses of collections so entrusted to the communities, instead of to the present Government officials. Some provinces of Turkey consented to a double or triple tax, provided only that the adjustment of details might be left to the people themselves. In truth the worst evils of our revenue department, are those which do not appear on the surface of the revenue records: they consist, I humbly conceive, in the inequality which so much aggravates the exorbitance of taxation, and in the wastage and embarrassment between the pockets of the people and the exchequer of Government: we, in fact, number more than we eat, and spill between the cup and the lip. But it seems to me that all these evils—the exorbitance—the inequality and the wastage in collection might, at least, be mitigated, if collective self-adjustment were substituted for individual coercion of revenue.

The work of municipal reform (I scarcely dare to mention it now) must wait also on primary education. Collectors, however, should meanwhile, in a general way, consult the communities, as to their sentiments regarding their headmen, &c., of the large villages and towns, and thus initiate and foster the elective idea, with all the salutary feelings of downward responsibility, political existence and citizenship, which the elective idea involves, and which alone, when duly developed, can ever be expected to teach us the necessary absolutes of our general government, and mitigate the growing and dangerous centralization and consequent wickedness of Government.

Yes, Sirs, some say that there is danger in initiating such mu-

* I have heard civilians urge, as a main reason against the employment of natives, that it involves a loss of situations "to the service"; that is to the favoured caste: I apprehend that such sentiment operate very much towards the exclusion of natives from honourable ambition.

† Mr. Trevelyan evidently considers "the masses" a very unimportant section of the social system. He is all for free education (through the tedious and corrupt medium of Hindoo-English.) In the even, from which the many will derive about as much benefit as the many in the dark ages of England did from Oxford and Cambridge. Mr. T.'s idea of 12,000 per annum for education, suggests the idea of Folsard's half penny worth of bread to the gallons of mead.

* This would soon bear chiefly on the servility of society.

† Were not Judicial bent and cattle dealing, "to a considerable extent," considered by Sir C. M. and others, perfectly venial?

municipal and provincial self-government, as may relieve the central authority; but is there certainly no danger in not doing so? Is there none in the central Government becoming the sole object and butt of censure, odium and emulation, when the new theories propagated by the press of liberty and so forth, take effect and come into contact with the social facts to which they are opposed, when they force on the people (say in a season of famine) comparisons of what they are and what they will consider themselves entitled to be? Are the words of Badico-Conservativa De Tocqueville to fall on the ground like split water—the words in which he declares that “Townships and municipal bodies and counties may be looked on as concealed break waters, which can check and part the tide of popular excitement?” I submit, I would say, Gentlemen, that it is rather dangerous not to initiate some such means of drawing off from the central authority some of the new energies, theories and familiarities which otherwise will more and more converge and rush on the central authority—their most obvious and only mark. An inference of perpetual security from such consummations cannot (I submit) be drawn from the past: for heretofore the Government has had two defences, namely, an ignorant prestige and a standing army; but now there will be but one, for the prestige is being dissolved by the press, and nothing will remain but the standing army, so, when we freed the press, we took no simultaneous steps to conciliate the people—no steps to substitute affection for the prestige we were about to destroy. Then we have nothing between the Government and the populace: but the soldiers propitiated, it is true, by a liberal pensionary system: but woe to the Government if it ever depends more on propitiating the army than on propitiating the people; for the end of such would be a Government of sentry boxes, the necessity of which would decrease only with the depopulation and desolation of its provinces.

CABANDEIRA.

RANGPORE UNITED SOCIETY.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Allow me to forward you the following account of the Rangpore United Society, founded by Messrs. T. A. Shaw, and Rajmohan Ray Chowdry, in association with some of the principal Landholders, and other respectable gentlemen of Rangpore, and to request the favour, that you will give it a little space in a corner of the Friend of India for general information.

At a preliminary meeting, held at the Rangpore Grammar School, on the 9th of March last, the United Society was organized with the following objects in view, viz.

- First. To support the rights of Landholders, and their tenants.
- Secondly. To encourage Agriculture in all its branches.
- Thirdly. To aid the Public Authorities in local improvements.
- In order to affect the first object of the Society, viz., to support the rights of the Landholders, and their tenants, it was resolved,
  - I. That the Landholders are to arbitrate the disputes of the members of the Society.
  - II. To correspond with similar Societies.
  - III. Directly or through the medium of similar Societies to make respectful representations to Government.
  - IV. To act always in conformity with the letter, and spirit of all existing acts, orders, and proclamations of Government, and to assist in promulgating the same.
  - V. To pay, in proportion to the Sudder Jumma, of each Landholder, for all expenses incurred in supporting their particular rights.

In order to affect the second object, viz., that of encouraging Agriculture in all its branches, the United Society is,

- I. To appoint a secretary who, as professor of Agriculture, is to lecture publicly, and by means of an experimental Farm to teach the sciences practically.
- II. To form a library, and museum.
- To effect the third object, viz., that of aiding the public authorities in local improvement.

I. To afford personal aid to the public authorities, and to render them pecuniary assistance in the construction of roads, bridges, and all public works as far as may appear expedient.

II. Each member to pay an annual sum of 25 Rupees for ordinary expenses, and a donation of books, or Agricultural, and Philosophical instruments.

The formation of this and other similar Societies show that India is making daily advancement in civilization, and knowledge of political rights. A few years ago many a Zemindar would barely submit to orders which, although given by public authority, very often bore not the least stamp of legality, but at present we find them ready to oppose such measures with firmness. Like every other civilized nation, they are assiduously ascertaining the legal demands of Government, and respectfully petitioning the rulers for the modification and repeal of such laws as are injurious to them as a body. Thus by making it a common cause, they are supporting the political privileges, and rights of every individual, at the same time they are not shewing themselves ignorant of their duty of submission to every legal measure, and are not wanting in zeal to assist Government in rendering those measures efficient.

Attention to the science of Agriculture also bespeaks the progress of civilization. Barbarous nations from ignorance of its knowledge do not enjoy one sixteenth part of the blessings which are brought within the reach of Agricultural people. The former have to depend only on hunting, and fishing, which at least being precarious means of subsistence, they are led to a wandering life, a mode of existence that is, in fact, little better than that of the beasts of the forest. But the latter, from the natural course of their avocation, being forced to fixed habitations are enabled, in addition to the productions of the earth, to breed up cattle, and other useful animals, so that they are enabled not only to secure for themselves and family, a sure and permanent means of subsistence, but also contribute in a great measure to the increase of population, consequently to the progress of knowledge, at the same time, by the productions of new goods, to assist the acceleration of manufacture and commerce, which bring men to an accession of wealth, and reputation. But in ministering only to the pleasures and appetites of the body without the culture of the mind, man would not, says an author, enjoy half the delight, nor discharge half the duties of life. The mind, however, could never be properly formed without the aid of wealth, the production of which is in a greater degree attributable to Agriculture. If the farmers had not laboured to produce more corn, and the shepherd more mutton than they could consume, the world could never have been blessed with those philosophical, and literary productions which bid immortality, and fame to the names of some of the ancients and moderns.

But, notwithstanding the greater extent of land, and the superior fertility of soil, the productive power of India falls far short of that of England. Here the people with all their sacrifices, and supplications to the Deities, and Peers, very often obtain a harvest hardly sufficient for six months consumption; the inhabitants of that enlightened land, however, are enabled by the power of scientific knowledge, to compel the earth to yield up her fruits. The advantages of this useful, and pleasure-giving science, will never be fully attained by the Hindus, until the enlightened, and rich among them contribute to the propagation of its knowledge. The farmers of this country must not depend on the assistance of a plough, and koolah only, for a plentiful produce, but should, like those of England, endeavour to secure the assistance of knowledge, and observation. By keeping small pieces of experimental grounds in various parts of their land, they must learn their difference of fertility, and their willingness, or otherwise to afford nutrition to particular plants. They must observe and know the unfailing season of sowing seed, at the same time, not forget to introduce machinery to forward manual labour.

As the slender stock of Agricultural knowledge which the Hindus possess is quite inadequate for the production of rich and plentiful harvests, the Rangpore United Society have resolved to engage a Professor, who is to give public lectures, and afford experimental knowledge of the science to Ryaots, of those Zemindars who are members of, and subscribers to the Society. It is hoped, that the formation of this institution will be gratifying to every one who is a friend to native improvement, and that this Society will remain a permanent memorial of the benevolence and humanity of the founders.

A well wisher.

THE HON. MR. WILSON, AND THE PARSEE CONVERTS.
To the Editor of the Bombay Courier.

SIR,—Though for some time past, I have observed various misrepresentations made, in certain quarters, connected with the conversion of the two Parsee youths to whom I lately administered the sacred rites of baptism, I have hitherto refrained from publicly noticing them, and that both from an anxious desire to avoid doing any thing which might be misunderstood, and might contribute to foster, instead of allay, that undue excitement which has existed in certain portions of the Parsee community, and from the general satisfaction which I have felt in the manner in which the conductors of the newspaper press of Bombay have treated a very delicate subject. The article which you have copied from the Bengal Hurkaru, however, is so erroneous in point of fact, and offensive, yet mild and plausible, in its insinuations, that it compels me to break silence. I trust that you will kindly allow me, through the medium of your wide-circulated paper, to make it the subject of a few brief observations.

1. "It is admitted," says your contemporary, "that in the first instance, they [the Parsees] proceeded legally by serving on a writ for the recovery of the youths alleged to have been decoyed and forcibly detained from their friends." I am not aware that any admission of this kind has, either publicly or privately been made in this quarter; and certain as I, that one more incoincident with fact could not possibly have been made. The first measures directed against myself and the converts, were those of illegal hostility, the violation of the sanctuary of my own dwelling, and the assault upon our own person. This fact has been established upon oath, in no far as the late prosecution compelled us to exert it; and if we have not proceeded the offenders, and their alleged instigators, on the criminal side of the Supreme Court, it is only because of our love of peace, and our hope that the day is not far distant when another motive than that of the terror of justice may lead them to repentance. Of some of these circumstances, the conduct of the Hurkaru is scarcely less accurate than its altogether ignorant, for the first notice of the conversions which would reach him, and which is to be found in an editorial article of the Bombay Gazette of the 3rd of May last, contained this intimation:—"On Monday last, an attempt was made to carry him [the second youth] by violence from Doctor Wilson's house, but it was defeated by the assistance of his domestics and some Malabar teachers, who assisted by the superior assistance of his rescue. Being followed in this endeavor, the parties went away, and shortly after returned with a policeman, and tried to have the young man removed on a charge of his having carried away some of the family jewels; but this scheme was ineffectual, was found wholly impracticable, and has been condemned by the relatives more immediately concerned." It was I who first suggested to the Parsee the propriety and necessity of their having recourse to the tribunals of justice, as they have admitted in their own affidavits. When I did so, the person in Bombay most immediately concerned with the youths, frankly told me that he had no fault to find with my proceedings in the case, and no wish to interfere with his Nephew, except what arose, from his desire to preserve his own situation and life, and to maintain his own position in the Parsee cast, many of the members of which have threatened to injure him, in case he should not exert himself to rescue his Nephew! Sir John Awdry, when delivering judgment, properly observed, that the individual to whom I refer was "an instrument in the hand of others."

2. Your contemporary observes, "That in their eloquent denunciations of the violence of the Parsees, our Bombay friends appear entirely to overlook the large allowance that ought to be made for the feelings to which the violation of long cherished prejudices and the disruption of the dearest ties of domestic life, caused by conversion, naturally tend to give rise." Ample allowance should be made for the excitement which these conversions, so ostentatiously paraded before the native community, have created." This remonstrance is probably intended for some of the gentlemen of the "broad sheet," but even as directed to those who are manifestly unjust; because they have all made the greatest allowances for the wounded feelings of the Parsee, in no far as they did not seek an expression in illegal acts. Parsee connected with the conversions, there was none, either before the Native and European community. The religious services were conducted with the greatest simplicity and solemnity no account of them, by any Missionary, has yet been published; the notices of them, contained in the Bombay newspapers, except perhaps when the merits of my own discourse were adverted to, were sober and veritable, and such as become honourable gentlemen who may be supposed to have no objections to the peaceable propagation of our holy faith in this benighted land. The Parsees are the parties who have given notoriety to the late change of religious sentiment "They," it is properly observed by the Madras Spectator, "have conferred upon the conversion of two Parsee converts, publicity from the India to Cape Comorin, which it might otherwise, in all probability, have never obtained."

3. The Hurkaru alludes to the "possibly temporary conversion of two half-educated youths" and asks "May not the prejudiced Parsees at least be well excused for doubting how far the reasoning powers of such youths can have been equal, even to comprehend the mysteries of our faith, and the reasoning of Mr. Wilson, a European Scholar, in their support." I can of course be no guarantee for the soundness of the faith of the Parsee, any more than of any other converts, though the decided and devoted part which they have lately acted, in spite of the most atrocious threats on the one hand, and the most liberal offers of employment and promotion on the other, inspire me and all who are acquainted with them, with the most encouraging hope of their proving ornaments to the Christian cause. As to their education, and competency to judge for themselves in matters of religion, the Parsees have not the slightest right to complain. It is long since they were both constituted disciples of Zoroaster on their own responsibility, and according to the forms of the Parsee faith. As far as the knowledge of the essential principles of Christianity is concerned, I believe that they would gain admittance into the strictest communion in Europe. The youngest of them is not inferior in point of general education to any of the Parsee gentlemen who bear the Majesty's commission of the Peace. Should any of them doubt the correctness of my statement on this point, I shall be happy to submit the matter to the judgment of any umpires who may be equitably selected by both parties, and who will permit a public examination to be conducted before judgment is pronounced. I make this proposal without any wish to detract from the Hon. Mr. Justice, though I allow that I adopt, with such of them as complain the argument ad hominem. Will the Bengal Hurkaru venture to be their Surety?

4. "The Parsees urge, indeed," says your eastern friend, "that the boys have been seduced by a species of bribery. It is needless to say, that we entirely acquit Mr. Wilson of having had any recourse to any improper means; but we do think that his proceedings, if rightly represented, have not been sufficiently guarded against the appearance of holding out temptation to the conversion of the two youths, whose conversion has created such an excitement. Conveying them about in his own carriage, and petting them, as he appears to have done, must in the eyes of the Parsees, have a very suspicious appearance." The Parsees, I would remark, showed no want of will, during the late trial, to prove that any improper, or suspicious means were resorted to effect the conversion of the youth; but they had no little hope of success in such an endeavour that they did not even attempt it. An accidental ride in a carriage, no new thing with either of the converts, as it is no unusual distinction of thousands of their tribe; but it so happens that no favour which they ever received from me in reference to conveyance had a particle of influence connected with the change of their religious sentiments. Neither of them was accommodated with a seat in any vehicle belonging to me till a few days before the baptism took place, and till such time as they and I were well assured that their life and liberty would have been in danger, in the part of the town through which they had to pass, had they not enjoyed the protection of a European. No instance of my "petting" them, has been condescended on; and, of course, I must be silent on this great and important topic. I must observe, however, that so difficult do the Parsees find it to account for the conversions on any worldly principles, that not a few of them actually attribute them to the influence of magic dispensed by myself, or of some unknown medical specific which I have furtively administered; and that recourse has actually been had by some persons,—whether Athorasan or Bedia, I do not here say, to a countermagic to destroy the potency of my supposed charms. In the pages of the Durpan, you will find, if I mistake not, a story about my encountering and defeating a devil in the jungle of the Northern Konkan, and brought forward with a purpose, to explain the past occurrences; and to guard the native community against holding intercourse with me in the time which is to come! It is a curious circumstance, that the remedy for the infidelity of the youth as to the institutes of Zoroaster, seriously recommended by some of their friends is not a discussion as proposed by the Zin, but a copious potation of Nirang and the repetition of the Nirang accompanied with the words Yatha Akario and which is said to have been often effectual in securing the flight of Ahirman himself. Of this fact I have the written proof in my possession.

5. The concluding remarks of your contemporary on "some of these Missionary Schools," I am not called particularly to notice, as they are probably intended to tell against some institutions immediately under my editorial eye, which require no defence from any humble pen. I beg to say, however, that, while I consider it a solemn duty to communicate Christian instruction to all youths to whom my legitimate influence extends, I can never be accused, by any person in the slightest degree acquainted with my engagements, connected either with the private apartment, the scientific or theology lecture-room, the scene of public discourse, or the wide-working press, of being among the number of those who "address themselves exclusively ly to the very young or the very ignorant." "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Romans, both to the wise and to the unwise." However, wherever my Missionary Services may be, they have not been restricted in their objects. I have taught the alphabet to a despised outcast, and Newton's Principles to the son of a title lord. I have met the learned Bhatts, the Jais, the Maulavis, and the Dastur, on the arena of public discussion and debate; and my exposition of their systems of error, and which are founded on direct appeals to the Vedas, Puranas, Koran, and Vedantic literature, still unannulled. I have preached that Gospel which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, from Cutchi to Canara, and from the island of Bombay to the plains of Berar, and that in the vernacular dialects of all the interesting provinces. And I have addressed all classes of the community, literally from the prince in the hall of royalty to the beggar on the hill of ashes. "That which I speak, I speak, and it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting," but you know who is my exemplar, and the occasion of my folly.

6. The Bengal Bankrupt If I understand him aright, seems to wish the Missionaries of India, in the first instance, to confine their efforts for the education of the young to secular instruction. Connected with this subject, we are all willing to enter into a solemn covenant with him, and his people, to support the system to which he is attached; and to have it signed, sealed, and supported by the most terrible sanctions. This covenant, however, must embrace certain conditions, but none of which are in the slightest degree unreasonable. The secularists must agree to suspend, during infancy and youth, the development of the evil passions which are congenial to the human frame. They must ward off all the temptations which come from a corrupted world, and the enticements of the spirits of darkness. They must interdict the vices of the king of terrors, and secure a maturity of years for all whom they would leave undisturbed by the disciples of Christ. And they must find compensation for the peace, and purity, and joy, which our holy faith brings with it, even to the youngest over whom it exercises its benignant sway. If they will satisfy us of their ability and willingness to effect these simpler arrangements, we shall be content to confine our ministrations to men of ripened powers or advanced years; but if they can give us no guarantee on the subject, we must continue to follow our present course. If we find that the original depravities of our nature, when not restrained by the power of heavenly truth strengthen themselves with the strength, and grow with the growth, of the child in whom they dwell; if we see the world spreading its thousand snares for the incautious and unguarded, and be assured by infallible testimony that "the Adversary goeth about as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour;" if we see the arrows of death, with undiminishing flight, moving amidst the most tender and infantile, as well as among those who are in the prime of manhood, and the men of hoary hairs; and if we can find no "balan," but "that which is in Gehenna" for wounded souls, and no fountain, but that which has been opened in Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness,"—and no heaven, but that of Jehovah, to satisfy the aspirations of an elevated soul, we shall glory, and abound in our present labours, putting all our trust and our confidence in Him whose promises we so abundantly find in the pages of divine inspiration.

But I must conclude. While I write thus freely, I have no wish to underestimate any of the blessings of education which the Bankrupt would give to the natives, when they are connected, either with an enlightened literature, or a sound philosophy. I give him credit for cordially admitting and feeling "the importance, even to the moral elevation of the people, and their temporal happiness, of their conversion to Christianity." I give him thanks for a frequent and enlightened advocacy of the sacred cause of religious liberty. I take as indulgent view, as he possibly can of the present mismanagement of many of the members of the Parsee community. I exempt a large portion of that body from the charge of their having done any thing to violate the principle of religious freedom, and to disturb the peace of the community. And I hope that all will soon be disposed to give us credit for those measures, which the novelty of the late movements in Bombay, have prevented them from calmly contemplating, and rightly considering. I live to ensure them not to injure them, but to seek their welfare; and in its advancement, I shall ever rejoice.

Wishing you all success in your editorial labours.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

JONAS WILSON.

COMPARATIVE MERITS OF IRON AND TIMBER STRAIN BOATS.—What, then, are the peculiarities of iron as a material for steam ships, that give it a preference over timber? Timber has, first, its principal strength only in one direction. From the reedy, fibrous, vascular structure of the vegetable, it resists a distending force with great strength along the fibres, but offers a very slender opposition to any force that would tear the vegetable fibres asunder so as to split or splinter it. To remedy this evil, there must always be two acts of timber in transverse direction. The planks of a ship are laid with their fibres in one direction, and the timbers are laid with their fibres at right angles, for the purpose of giving strength laterally, and binding them together. But iron plates are nearly equally strong in both directions, so that if we conceive a plank of wood obtained of strength equal to iron lengthways, and a second plank procured of the same size, with fibres in the lateral direction, the one plate of wood would have nearly the same tensile strength as both united. If, therefore, we substitute for the planking of the vessel a shell of iron, the cross-timbers become unnecessary, their place being supplied by the lateral strength of the metal.

The next peculiarity of iron is the perfection and strength of its joinings. To make a wooden ship water-tight, its parts are severely strained—in caulking the planking, a very acute wedge-shaped tool forces the osakun by a mallet in between the planks, which only retain it by a strain; and from the direction of the planks a vessel begins to leak whenever she encounters a heavy gale. "The riveting of the iron plates effects a thorough union of them of such a nature as to render the joints closer than those of the newest ship, and instead of remaining detached, like planks, they become integral parts of one homogeneous whole, equally strong in every direction. A well-built iron vessel is almost battle-tight."

The facility with which iron can be formed into any shape, and made of any size, is its next recommendation. Timber must be selected with much care and at great expense, in order to suit those parts of the vessel where it is to be placed, and the form of the vessel is in some measure trammelled by the shape of timber that can be readily obtained for the purpose. It is also cut out at great expense, rendering what remains of comparatively little value. On the other hand, every shape of iron can be wrought into any required form, and not a pound be lost, but be made available to any purpose, while all the planks, and knees, and bolts, and straps, have that form given to them by which they are kept in their place. Facility, economy, strength of construction, appear then to favour the iron.

Diminution of danger from fire may perhaps be regarded as not one of the least advantages of iron ships from the perfection of its joinings, and from the want of transverse timbers. It follows that the hull of an iron vessel will both be almost entirely strong and tight, although only of half the weight of a timber vessel; hence the difference may be applied in engines and fuel, or a great saving of space effected.

Finally, if surface condensation be adopted, the cold surface of the vessel exposed to the water may be used for a condenser, by having an inner lining or jacket over the part so used, sufficiently stayed asunder at small and frequent intervals.

All, however, that we have said as likely to follow from the extensive introduction of iron vessels, must be taken with great caution; and if very great precautions are not adopted in anticipating the many peculiarities of the metallic ships, serious evils will be the consequence.

For example—an iron vessel once met with the following accident:—Going along at full speed, something gave way about the engine—the piston-rod and piston went right down through the bottom of the cylinder and the bottom of the boat, into the sea, leaving its place of exit for the entrance of water: by an extraordinary coincidence, another steam vessel was alongside at that instant, and all were saved! Such an occurrence as this in the middle of the Atlantic or the Bay of Biscay would be rather awkward. Again: an iron vessel touched by accident a stone of considerable size, which perforated her bottom and she went down instantly—this is rather quick work. These facts are sufficient to point out the necessity of extreme caution in suddenly adopting the metallic ships on the large scale, and lead us to direct our attention to their structure, so as to avoid those dangers to which they may be peculiarly liable. Further: the rapidity with which iron ships are corroded by the action of salt water, is a point of interesting research. On this subject the experiments of the British Association, carried on under the direction of Mr. Mallet, of Dublin, (see Athenaeum, No. 586, p. 630) may be advantageously consulted.

With the view of preventing danger from accidental and local injury to the shell of the vessel, the strength of water-tight compartments already partially adopted, must be carried out to its greatest extent. The subdivision of the hold must be carried to a greater extent than any thing we have yet heard of; so that if by any chance water do flood its way into the hold, it shall only fill a small part of the vessel. To do this will be most difficult about the engines. These partitions will, however, have another very great advantage, in the strength and stiffness they will give to the hull of the vessel; it will become like the shell of the nautilus, capable of resisting an enormous external force. We have seen an iron vessel, whose length was ten times her beam, hung on two blocks at her extremities, without sensible flexure in the middle, and without any further means of internal support than her frequent partitions of iron plate.

But there is another point of primary importance, which will give much trouble if not properly provided for, and it is this:—the great weight of the engines and boilers placed about the centre of the length of the vessel. These produce a depression at the centre which is related sufficiently in a timber vessel, by the great depth of the keelson and of the bottom of the vessel, but which the thinness of the iron plate will not enable it to withstand. Further, the small quantity of matter in the hull renders it very subject to motion from the action and re-action of the steam and piston in the cylinder. We have noticed the centre of one of the finest iron steam ships rising and falling, twisting under the action of the engine in a manner both unpleasant to the passenger and very injurious to the shell of the vessel. These and similar evils are only to be guarded against by such a system of framing and tying as the Americans adopt in the very slender hulls of their river boats, and whereby the strain of the machinery becomes "self-contained," that is to say, is wholly counteracted by the strength of its own framing, and whereby the whole heaviest part of the vessel is made to contribute its own portion to the support of those strains which necessarily result from driving a vessel, from a single point within it, with great force against a resisting medium. For this purpose Mr. Russell, at the meeting of the Association to which we have alluded, proposed a great central system of framing, or what he called a spine, from its resemblance in structure and function to that part of the skeleton of an animal, by which its principal powers are obtained. As far as we understood him, it appeared to consist of a system of diagonal trussing of great lightness and strength, passing along the centre of the vessel from stem to stern, immediately above the keel, which was to form its lower portion, and reaching as far as the lower or upper deck, and thus occupying little more room than is now required for the deck pillars and beams along the keel. A similar diagonal system was also to be formed between the deck beams and at the bulkheads or partitions of the hull, so as to give strength and unity to the whole in its three dimensions. In a large vessel of iron, some such system, we think, be indispensable to strength and durability, otherwise the continual slight flexures of the iron will rapidly weaken and nip it through, causing it extensively and suddenly to give way. In a wooden vessel, the intervals between the timbers allow sufficient space for a diagonal framing on the system of Seppings; and therefore some equivalent provision must, as we have pointed out, be substituted when iron is the material employed. —Athensian.

AMERICAN COMMERCE.—The Boston Daily Advertiser gives the following abstract from a document appended to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting a statement in gross of the exports and imports of the United States for the year ending the 30th of September, 1858.—The amount of imports was 112,000,000 dollars, of which 90,146,000 dollars were free of duty, 22,634,000 dollars articles paying ad valorem duties, and 9,220,000 dollars paying specific duties. The amount of exports was 103,196,000 dol., of which 90,698,000 dollars consisted of domestic produce, and 12,470,000 dollars of foreign produce. "Since that period we have laid bare the great part of those sources of prosperity which we now enjoy. This quarter of a century has sufficed to increase the population of Norway by nearly one-half, to revive her commerce, to encourage industry, to create and consolidate a great number of institutions and public establishments, to diminish her debt by two-thirds, and to establish a system of extension which assures us that in 1840 it will be totally liquidated. To this rapid sketch must be added, that the treasury possesses, independent of its stocks and bonds, a more considerable sum than the whole remaining debt."

Head Quarters, Meerut, 28th May, 1889.

At a general court martial assembled at Meerut, on Tuesday the 14th day of May 1889, Lieutenant Henry James Mitchell, of the 73d Regiment Native Infantry, was arraigned on the following charges:—

Charge 1.—"1st.—For conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, in having, in the station billiard room, at Allahabad, on the night of the 18th March 1889, in the hearing of several gentlemen, repeatedly uttered concerning Lieutenant Gabriel Henry Whalley, who was not present, the words 'coward' and 'blackguard'; and other insulting expressions; and in having said to Lieutenant Stephen Whalley (one of the company, who had declared that he would inform Lieutenant Whalley) that he would apply the same expressions to him, if he did not that night bring him a hostile message from Lieutenant Whalley, which Lieutenant Whalley had previously refused to do."

"2d.—For insubordinate, disorderly and dishonourable conduct, in having, on the same night, returned to the billiard room, after the purpose of renewing his offensive language towards Lieutenant Whalley, after he had been directed by his commanding officer, Captain Peter Abbott, to go to his quarters in arrest."

Finding.—"The court, on the evidence before it, is of opinion, that Lieutenant Henry James Mitchell, of the 73d Regiment Native Infantry, is guilty of the first charge."

Also, that he is guilty of the second charge, with the exception of the words 'for the purpose of renewing his offensive language towards Lieutenant Whalley,' of which portion the court acquits him.

Sentence.—"The court sentences Lieutenant Henry James Mitchell, of the 73d Regiment Native Infantry, to be suspended from rank, pay and allowances, for six months."

Recommendation by the court.—"The court, taking into consideration the contrition the prisoner has expressed and the expenditure of mind and labour which he was labouring from a sense of the injury which he believed himself to have received from the prosecutor, would respectfully recommend his case to the favourable consideration of the Commander of the Forces."

REMARKS BY THE COMMANDER OF THE FORCES.

In consideration of the recommendation of the court, the Commander of the Forces is pleased to remit that part of the sentence which adjusts Lieutenant Mitchell to be suspended from "allowances," but to retain what is due to discipline and the peace of society, forbids him to remit the whole sentence. Lieutenant Mitchell has been convicted of a flagrant breach of duty as an officer and a gentleman, in the absence of any immediate provocation, and in violation of an oath, by which he had bound himself not to repeat the injury which he believed himself to have received from the prosecutor.

The suspension of Lieutenant Mitchell, from rank and pay, will take effect from the date of the publication of this order at Allahabad.

Medical department.—Ambassador Surgeon D. Gullam, from 20th November 1898 to 12th December 1898, in extension, to enable him to proceed and join his present appointment at Jaipur.

By order of the Commander of the Forces: J. R. LUMLEY, Major General, Adjutant General of the Army.

Head Quarters, Camp, Mahabubnagar, 12th May, 1899.

No. 2.—The General Commanding in Chief Her Majesty's Army has been known to the Commander-in-Chief in the East Indies, that certain questions relating to discipline, and the interpretation of an Article of War, had in a letter dated the 21st of March 1899, been submitted by Lieutenant Colonel Bolton of Her Majesty's 21st Regiment, to the Adjutant General of the Corps, direct, instead of being forwarded through the prescribed channel.

His Lordship comments on the unnecessary Correspondence occasioned by deviation from the instructions laid down in the Regulations of the Army on this subject; and he is of opinion, that Lieutenant Colonel Bolton would find it difficult to assign any reasonable pretext for not addressing himself on this occasion, to the General officer under whom he is serving; and he points out that the Lieutenant Colonel should be reminded of the necessity of adhering in future to the Regulations.

As more than one instance of this irregularity has occurred amongst Her Majesty's Regiments with this Army, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief deems it necessary to refer the Commanding officers of Regiments to the instructions, pages 61 and 62 of the Regulations and orders for the Army; which he desires may be more carefully adhered to in future.

TRANSLATION OF THE LAWS.—We rejoice to learn that Lord Auckland has, at length, issued directions for the appointment of a Translator of the Acts of Government, in the Bengalee and Oordoo languages. The appointments, it is affirmed, are to be filled up forthwith. We hear, moreover, that the nomination of Bengalee Translator has been assigned to the Government of India, and not to the Local Government of Bengal, within whose province it naturally falls; and that in consequence of this error, the selection has not been made on the deus digniori principle. The appointment of a Bengalee Translator is, under existing circumstances, a matter of considerable delicacy, as well as importance. The number of Europeans who, from their familiarity with Bengalee, might claim to be remembered in the present instance, is far from inconsiderable. The number of Natives, conversant with English, who are prepared to test the qualifications of the new Translator with philological nicety, is, perhaps, greater than Government has any idea of; and the wisdom of the choice which may be made, will be subjected to a severe scrutiny. It behoves the public authorities, therefore, to be wary in filling up an appointment, which, if given to any one in whom the public has no confidence, will not fail to engender loud complaints.

As the subject has now engaged the attention of Government, it is much to be wished that it had been viewed in all its bearings, and that arrangements had been at once made to secure to the Natives a full acquaintance with the uses and institutions under which they live. This might have been accomplished with ease, if, while the principle was sanctioned by the general Government, the local authorities had been directed to work out the details. It is not to be expected that Lord Auckland, residing at so great a distance from Calcutta, and engaged, as he is, with political combinations on a field of unparalleled magnitude, can find leisure for all the minutiae of arrangement, without which any such measure must fail of success. And, indeed, if both the general principles, and the subordinate details of the public administration are to be united in the same authority, the existence of a double government must appear to be altogether redundant. If the matter in hand be yet open for adjustment, we would venture to suggest, that the re-appointment of a Translator of the Acts will not satisfy either the claims of justice, or the wishes of the people. The subordinate legislation of the Sudder Board, and the Sudder Court, the highest legal and fiscal authority under the Supreme Council, requires to be made public through an accredited Translator, just as much as the regulations of the Legislative Council. Any arrangement which stops short of the translation into the Native languages, of whatever rules and ordinances the people are bound to obey, will be in the highest degree defective and anomalous. The simple translation of the Acts of Government, and the rules of the Judicial and Revenue Courts, however, will fail to meet the exigencies of the country. They must be made public; the plea of ignorance must be at once taken away from those who are penally bound to obey them. The most obvious mode of meeting this case, is the publication of an Official Gazette in the Native language. But if this enterprise appear too ambitious, let us, at least, have the translation of the Drafts of Acts, of the Acts themselves, and the Circular Orders published in the Native languages in the Calcutta Gazette; from whence the numerous Native journals will be enabled to transfer them to their own columns and thus to diffuse a knowledge of them through the country. Such is the practice at the Presidency, which, in our pride of place, we are accustomed to call 'the benighted.' In the Madras Gazette, the public ordinances are published in all the languages which prevail in the south of India; and if the Natives here are not deemed of sufficient importance to have an Official Gazette of their own, let us, at least, follow the example which the sister Presidency has been so long offering for our imitation.

The appointment of an Oordoo Translator in Calcutta is liable to much misadventure. Doubtless the metropolis of India furnishes a sufficient number of Europeans and Natives versed in that language, to secure accuracy; but, as this Presidency is separated into two divisions, over which two distinct Supreme Native Courts preside; and as the jurisdiction of one extends over the provinces in which Oordoo is universally prevalent, and as Bengalee predominates in the other judicial division of the country, it appears to be the dictate of reason and equity, that the preparation of the Oordoo version should be made in the Western Provinces, and that of the Bengalee, here. In that case, also, there would be equal propriety in printing the Acts at some one of the Presses which have been established at Agra and Delhi;—that is to say, if Dr. Corby and the Management of the Military Orphan Society will permit of such an incursion on the Monopoly. It seems unreasonable that the Natives of the West should be obliged to send down a thousand miles for copies of the Laws they are bound to obey, when the means of translating and printing them on the spot are completely at hand.

LORD AUCKLAND'S POLICY.—The Overland Mail just arrived, has brought the documents published by order of Parliament, relative to Russian interference in the affairs of Afghanistan, upon the strength of which Lord Auckland came to the determination of marching an army into that country, and establishing a British influence in Central Asia. We obtain from the same source the explanatory notes which have passed between the Courts of St. James and Petersburg, relative to the designs of Russia. They possess the deepest importance. The state paper drawn up by Lord Palmerston is a plain, open, manly statement of grievances; the reply of Count Nesselrode, though received by Her Majesty's Ministers "with a just sentiment of confidence," can scarcely fail to inspire any one who reads it, with a conviction that the feelings which were entertained regarding Russian encroachment in Western Asia, were not without foundation. Though drawn up with consummate diplomatic tact, it completely confirms the opinion that Persia is at the entire disposal of Russia; and that no step whatever has been or can be taken at Teheran, without the sanction of the Russian Minister. Thus the gross insult which was offered to our Court, by the detention of one of the messengers of the Envoy, is not to be repaired until Russia has pronounced that reparation is just. These documents prove incontrovertibly, that the first opening attempt had been made to bring Afghanistan under the same bond of relationship to Russia, in which Persia is involved. The Russian Ambassador guaran-ted the cession of Herat, when it should be conquered, to the Chiefs of Candahar; and thus endeavored to extend the influence of Russia to the very threshold of our empire. The reclamations of the English Cabinet lead the Emperor to disavow the guarantee, and to recall the Ambassador. A Russian Envoy was sent to Cabul, on a purely commercial mission, with a full Russian purse, who never opened his mouth about trade and manufactures, but began a series of political intrigues. Complaints were made of this violation of the good understanding which subsisted between Russia and England, and the Agent was recalled, and the political part of his mission disavowed. A perusal of these papers is sufficient to convince any one, of even moderate soundness, that the wisdom of the policy which Lord Auckland has pursued, is no less remarkable than the energy and zeal with which it has been carried into execution. These documents afford so clear a justification of his measures, that Lord Auckland can have no reason to fear lest his career of usefulness in India should be cut short by a vote of Parliamentary censure. Even Lord Brougham will scarcely venture to re-enact the Canada affair, or attempt to prevail on the House of Lords to send his "Noble relative" a bill of indemnity, for having acted "in the manner which seemed to him essential to ensure the safety, and to assert the power and dignity of the British Government." It is now manifest to the world, that His Lordship acted neither upon any premature conclusions, nor upon any ambitious impulse. When the accredited Agent of Russia was at our gate, and the most vaunting reports were industriously spread that the hordes of Central Asia were marshalled by Russia, and were preparing to pour down on the plains of India; and when these boasts had begun materially to shake the confidence of the subsidiary chiefs throughout India, it was time to make some demonstration. If, in these circumstances, Lord Auckland had neglected to take the most decisive steps; if he had hesitated, as in the case of Burmah, "the path of Russia would have been abundantly simplified," and His Lordship would have been justly considered as having betrayed his trust. By the active measures which have been pursued, a new turn has been given to affairs; the clouds of the political horizon have blown over; the rumours of foreign invasion, which filled every town, have died away. Russia pledges her interest with the Shah, to prevent his again entering on the siege of Herat; and our relations with Persia are likely, therefore, to be placed upon a more satisfactory footing. If Russia never entertained any design of establishing a political influence in Central Asia, and of creeping on to the portals of our empire, the explanations which have arisen out of the firm and decisive attitude of England, will serve to secure peace against those risks to which misunderstandings must expose it. If Russia entertained any ambitious views of extending her influence to the Indus, and a little beyond it, her plans have been baffled, and will, probably, now be folded up for a dozen years to come.

IMPROVEMENTS IN NATIVE SOCIETY.—We take shame to ourselves for having omitted to mention at the time, that the day on which the foundation stone was laid of the first Seminary for the cultivation of the Bengalee language, witnessed also the publication of the first Native Daily Paper, just twenty-one years and sixteen days after the first newspaper had been published in that language. Eeshur Chunder Goop has the merit of having sent forth the first daily paper among his countrymen; having on that day commenced the daily publication of his journal, the Prabodhak. We wish him the most ample success in his laborious enterprise. He has long laboured in the Editorial vocation, and is familiar with its difficulties and its prospects. He formerly edited a Native paper, which rose into sudden celebrity, from the classical and pungent wit with which it was adorned. It fell, however, into the back ground, and eventually expired, chiefly, we believe, from the vigour, and, perhaps, recklessness, of his satire. The Natives are not yet sufficiently accustomed to the freedom of Editorial censure, to continue for any length of time to support a paper, in which their own opinions or characters are exposed to ridicule. Eeshur Chunder has not that graceful and idiomatic flow of language by which the articles in the Chandrika are distinguished above those of all its competitors. He has not that simplicity of style which renders the writings of Bhubanee Churn Banerjee, the Editor of that paper, so pleasant to an unpurged taste. While we are strenuously opposed to what we consider the bigotry of that paper, it is but an act of justice to acknowledge the beauty of its composition. Eeshur Chunder, however, in his own line, has few equals. His style is vigorous and laconic; his arguments are keen, and his satire is tremendous. By the Natives his writing is considered, we believe, more classical than that of his rival; that is to say, it contains a larger admixture of Sungskrit words, which serve to astonish ordinary minds, and to gratify the learned; but it is more difficult of comprehension, and it is strongly marked with the vice of alliteration, to which clearness of comprehension is too often sacrificed. The Natives have yet to learn, that the great object of composition is not a display of learning, but intelligibility.

We take this opportunity of advertising to the establishment of a Circulating Library of English books among the Natives. It has been established for several months, and has obtained so large a measure of success, as to hold out hopes of its continued existence. It is another gratifying token of the thirst for knowledge with which the Native community in Calcutta is so largely imbued; and of the avidity for the acquisition of English which marks the present age. We have been favoured with a copy of its rules, by Baboo Ramgopal Ghose, a philanthropic Native, who, on the publication of the little History of Bengal, sent for a hundred copies for gratuitous distribution among the schools in Calcutta, with the view of exciting a desire among the youths of becoming acquainted with the history of their own country. To this circumstance, in a great measure, is to be attributed the fact, that nearly Two Thousand copies of the work have been bought up within the first six months of its existence.

THE NEW MAGISTRATE ACT.—Mr. Thackeray, a barrister of the Supreme Court, has addressed a letter, through the Hurkar, to all his countrymen in India, calling upon them strenuously to resist the Act now in embryo, for transferring the cognizance of cases of petty larceny from the Supreme Court to single Justices of the Peace. While we cannot but admire the spirit of patriotism which breathes through his address, and the perseverance with which he defends what he considers the rights of the subject, we are inclined to believe that his fears have, in this case, outrun his judgement. If this law pass, says he, "you will instantly have taxation, without representation." The Government, it's said, are about to open a new loan, because, owing to the expenses of the Cabul expedition on the one hand, and the winding up of the Opium trade on the other, the candle is burning away at both ends. But this, our Magistrate law, if it pass, will remove all necessity for any loan. "Your houses, your horses, your carriages, your servants, your every possession will be taxed." Mr. Thackeray has allowed his fears so far to overcome him, as to believe that this universal taxation upon every thing which it is pleasant to see, hear, touch, taste and enjoy, will not only be the inevitable result of this Act, but that it is the grand object of the Act itself. The Bill, though ostensibly a Bill for amending the criminal jurisprudence of Calcutta, is, in reality, a money bill; and he calls upon the community to resist this iniquitous attempt at taxation. The Government are at their wit's end for money, and this, it seems, is the plan, conceived in the lust of power, which has been devised for filling the public exchequer. "And you, my countrymen, are offering yourselves as sheep to the shearer. Rely upon it they will cut you to the quick." After having exhausted all the arguments furnished by that love of patriotism and of constitutional privileges, which is inherent in Englishmen, he applies himself to their love of money, and directs a cogent argument to their breeches pockets. It is impossible not to believe Mr. Thackeray to be in earnest, and we cannot, therefore, but respect his motives; but at the same time we lament the expenditure of so much honest sweat in a cause which is likely to meet with so little co-operation.

This Act was notoriously forced upon the Legislative Council, by the repeated remonstrances of the Grand Jury,—by the galling invectives of the public press, more particularly of the Hurkaru, which were directed against the monstrous anomalies of the present system,—and by the unanimous voice of society. The Act was conceived in pure benevolence, credited in sympathy for those who were oppressed by the 'nuisance,' and it was designed for the general relief of the community, good as well as bad. We think that if ever there was an Act of the Legislative Council of India, of which the motive could not be mistaken,—whatever may be said of its character,—it was this Act. If the reader can picture to himself the astonishment of the Supreme Council when it was, for the first time, apprized, that the great object of this Act was to saddle the good people of Calcutta with the expenses of the Cabul expedition, then is he prepared to comprehend the emasculation of the barber, when Don Fernando informed him, that the honourable assembly at the inn had solemnly come to the conclusion, that the razor was nothing more or less than Mambrino's helmet. If this be a plea of taxation, it is certainly the most awkward, clumsy inefficient scheme which was ever devised. Any apprentice in Downing Street would have managed the business more cleverly.—Whereas it is necessary that funds should be raised to defray the extraordinary expenses incurred in the expedition beyond the Indus, and that these funds should, for the greater part, be contributed by the inhabitants of Calcutta, be it enacted with the view of providing the necessary funds for this object, that all cases of petty larceny in the town of Calcutta, in which the value of the articles stolen does not exceed Twenty Rupees, shall be cognizable by a single Justice of the Peace.

We must candidly confess that we are unable to trace the connection between the trial of a larcenous cooly, or even a larcenous bar, by a single Justice of the Peace, and the imposition on the community of all the expenses of this "most just and necessary war"; and we farther confess, that much as we have hailed the publication of this Act,—always including in it the improvements of which it is susceptible,—as a relief to Judges, relief to Juries, Grand and Petit; and last, though not least, relief to the poor culprit, if we could bring our minds to the conviction that this relief was to be purchased at the expense of the community of which we form a part; that it would entail on us the payment of the costs of Rupees, which the Cabul expedition has cost, so completely does self interest blind the judgement, that we should be disposed to welcome back the old nuisance. No; better, ten thousand times better, were it that the grand and the petit jury should assemble four times in the year to sit in judgement on a hundred or even a thousand larcenous, false-stealing coolies; better even,—the reader must forgive our selfishness,—that the cooly should lie in jail for three calendar months waiting for the Quarterly Sessions, than that we should be called on to pay up the expenses of sentencing Shah Soojah-cool-Moolk on the throne of his ancestors. In this case the remedy would be infinitely worse than the disease.

NATIVE CHRISTIAN PROTECTION SOCIETY.—Amongst our Selections in another page will be found the Prospectus and proposed Rules of a new Society with the above denomination, as they have appeared in the Calcutta Christian Observer and Christian Advocate. The object of the Society must commend itself to every benevolent mind: and we can testify from our own experience, that the evils, for which its originators would provide a remedy, are neither rare nor trivial. Residents in our cities have little conception of the power which the Landowners have over the peasantry on their estates, or of the cruel oppression with which it is frequently exercised. Their object generally is the extorting of money; but the same apparatus which is applied for this end, is equally capable of effecting wrong of other kinds, and amongst them the wrong of religious persecution. In this the Zemindars are sometimes the instigators of the populace, and sometimes for popularity their abettors; and in either case they have multiplied expedients at hand for the accomplishment of their wishes. Many of these are connected with the tenure or cultivation of land; and others are of the nature of personal violence, fines, or imprisonment. Besides many petty annoyances, which to poor people become heavy sufferings, we have known the cruelty of Zemindars carried to the last extreme against their Christian tenants. We have known both mother and babe perish together by the inhuman prohibition of the assistance of the village midwife, by the petty tyrant against whose mandate none dare even save the life of a fellow creature; and we have known the virtuous females of a peaceable family subjected to the last outrages of brutal violence, under similar authority and influence. We have, therefore, a strong feeling on the subject, and consider the claim of the Native Christians to whatever protection can be obtained for them most powerful.

We should certainly have been better pleased, if such protection could have been procured by some other means than the formation of a public society. We like neither the exposure to the public gaze of the sufferings, the wrongs, and, it may be, the weaknesses of the Christian converts, nor the tone of defiance which is liable to be engendered both in the Missionaries and their people, by the course which a Society of this kind must take in the management of its affairs. It would have been more scriptural, and more salutary, for the several churches, with which persecuted Native converts may be connected, to charge themselves with their protection. It is true the poverty of the purely Native churches is too great, to admit of their members doing much to help each other; but all our Native churches, at the Presidency at least, are closely connected with European congregations, to whom it would be no matter of difficulty to supply all that could need to be expended in this way. We persuade ourselves that the congregations at the Old Church, St. James's, St. Andrew's, Union Chapel, the Circular Road and the Lall Bazar Chapel would consider it a privilege to be called upon for such an exercise of Christian sympathy; and they could manage the business better than a Society.

Nevertheless, if there must be a Society, we cannot but recommend it to general support. We do not, however, altogether like the recommendations which have been given by the Provisional Committee. There is an over-urine, and, consequently, a sort of hardness, about them, and a narrow limitation of the Society's interference, of which we do not perceive the reasonableness. For instance, it is recommended, "that no case of alleged oppression be entertained, except from bona fide communicating members of the several churches." The only object we can perceive in this restriction is to secure such a guarantee against imposition, as may be found in an open and consistent profession of adherence to the gospel.

That guarantee is certainly of considerable value; but it is by no means essentially necessary, and it is proposed to obtain it at too great a cost—even the sacrifice of a principal part of the Society's object. It is generally when there is the first manifestation of regard to the gospel, that the most active and bitter hostility is excited against those in whom it appears. Lucidat converts are those who both have most to fear, and are the least able to withstand the persecution to which they are exposed. Their exclusion, therefore, from the compassionate aid of the Society seems both impolitic and ungenerous. It is saving trouble in investigation, so as to guard against imposition, at too great a sacrifice. Besides, this regard to standing in Church fellowship has two bearings. Whilst it promises trustworthiness in the objects of the Society's benevolence, it has a very suspicious tendency towards the proscription of the solemn ordinances of the gospel. After the fashion of the old, and happily abrogated, Test and Corporation Act, it sacrifices secular advantages and immunities with attendance at the communion table—a mode of dealing with religion which cannot be avoided with too great jealousy.

Neither do we like the recommendation, "that no case be received from any person belonging to a Church whose Pastor is not a member of this Society." The very end of the Society is the relief of suffering piety in our converts; but here is a capricious exclusion from relief of, it may be, numbers of them, without the slightest regard to the extent of their afflictions, or the merits of their character. It might happen, under such a rule, that individuals of the greatest worth, and in the deepest affliction, having the misfortune to be under the care of a Pastor indifferent to their misery, would have their afflictions aggravated, by being deprived of sympathy and help from others also, through his fault and not their own. Whilst the Society exercise all possible circumspection, they should not be so ready to stint their generosity.

LETTERS FROM THE RED SEA, EGYPT, AND THE CONTINENT: BY JAMES EDAILL, M. D. (Second Notice.)—In our farther notice of Dr. Edaille's Letters we shall confine ourselves to his observations on Egypt. That country is at the present time, as the turnpike gate on the new road to England, of more interest than Malta, or Italy; and it has not yet become quite so commonly trodden by our tourists. By this selection, however, we have no intention to intimate any disparagement of Dr. Edaille's notices of Naples, Rome and Florence. On the contrary, we have found his observations, even on the most frequented ground, to possess a particular charm, from the extended range of comparisons he enjoys, through his previous residence in India. Had he been a systematic traveller, making careful and lengthened investigations respecting the countries he visited, we have no doubt that many traces, analogies, and comparisons of other times and nations, would have been brought out by him which no mere European traveller would notice. As it is, his hurried remarks are just sufficient to remind one that a person familiar with the East, is able to look on strange countries and their inhabitants in a point of view which adds greatly to their effect. In India we live in daily intimacy with forms of life and character, in many respects, the same as were characteristic of ancient Greece and Rome: and even their points of difference, as well as of resemblance, are pregnant with illustration and instruction to one who visits the consecrated scenes of former European life and grandeur.

But we return to Egypt: and, first, of its aspect. Of course the peculiar object of the country is the Nile. Dr. Edaille, in his short ascent to Thebes, had the advantage of looking on the Nile from its banks, with the face of the country also in view; and then he gives this description of it:

"The road, a raised mud bank, crack'd by the sun, and broken by canals for water, lay along the margin of the Nile. There can be no good high-ways where the yearly inundation reaches. The river is the great high way, running in the middle of the narrow valley, which is from one to six miles broad; so that any point inland, is easily reached. I am disappointed in the size of the Nile here; it is not so large as any of the three great rivers of Hindoostan, the Ganges, the Jumna, or the Godavari. I should say it was about the width of the Thames at Westminster. Its name, meaning blue, led me to expect a different colour from the reality, for it is quite muddy, from the quantity of sand constantly blown into it. It has the advantage, as an object in the landscape, over the Indian rivers, that it scarcely flows in banks, even at the lowest, which makes the scenery on its banks more river-like, than in India, where the shrunk stream leaves mounds of white sand, on either side of it. The valley varies in breadth, according to the distance of the hills, which on the Desert side, are low and undulating; and on the other, they may be called mountains—a precipitous chain of red rock runs down all this side of the valley. There is little, except in this boundary of the horizon, to show that I am not in India. There is the same complete cultivation, and richness of crops. The date groves are more numerous, than the other kinds of palms in India; but the surface wants the fine mango tops of dark green, to break the monotony of the vegetable carpet. In short, the confined view and broken horizon, are the only advantages of the Egyptian over Indian scenery—both are 'towards perdition.' I am glad that I took this ride, as it has given me a better idea of the country, than I should have had, in going by water."

Afterwards, descending the stream in a boat he speaks of it in this way:

"After the first comprehensive view of the Nile, there is absolutely nothing to be seen on this river. I could still fancy myself on the great, unmeaning, featureless Ganges. Unbroken mud banks, only permitting the tops of the trees to be seen, a little inland; an unvaried line of precipitous red rock, now receding some miles from the stream; at other times lying close along it; ugly rambling villages, with a few date trees around them, is all that can be seen from the river."

"The Nile is greater than it at first seemed to me, averaging one-third of a mile in width, I should think. An astonishing size, when one recollects, that it receives no tributary stream for eight hundred miles of its course, evaporating under a powerful sun, and drained at every step, for irrigation of the fields. The Nile water deserves all the praise lavished on it, thus immense—red. And I pretend to be a judge, having been a water drinker for many years. It is the sweetest water I ever tasted, deliciously light, and soft, and I nearly drank myself into a drowsy, on coming off the Desert. We are now passing at the foot of the corks, where the mark left by the high Nile may be seen, twenty feet, at least, above the present stream. What a current must set in, against this rock!"

The following is a specimen of the epigrams of a Nile voyage:

"7th May, GIZA.—Never was more uncomfortable in my life, than from three o'clock yesterday, till sunset. It came on to blow hard, up the river, bringing such quantities of sand that the opposite bank could not be seen. My hut (a temporary erection of sails and mats in the boat) being open at both ends, I had to sit in a current of sand, for several hours, with my eyes firmly shut. When the gale abated, my blankets, &c. were co-tered with a layer of sand as thick as a shilling, and my skin was quite begrimed with fine dust, and my ears and nostrils filled with sand. A cleansing in the Nile, after all was over, compensated in some measure, for the disagreeable sand-bath.

"A strong wind blows up the valley of the Nile, nearly all the year; Egypt being placed like a funnel, between the Mediterranean and Abyssinia. There is a singular equality in the atmosphere, as to moisture and dryness, throughout the year. The early inundation scarcely affords the dryness of the air, so that it is "as dry as a bone" all the year, nor is the heat sensibly diminished by the rise of the waters. In this respect it is very different from India, having no rain, and no moist atmosphere. There are no mountains, of sufficient height in Egypt, to arrest the heavy clouds, seen hurrying up the valley, and precipitate them in rain. They however return in the middle of June, in the shape of the flooded Nile, charged with the rains of Abyssinia. The river continues increasing till the middle of October, when the whole country is under water, except the sites of villages, where all the live stock and grain are collected, as in so many arks. On the reflux of the waters in November, a thin layer of black mud is left, and the soil enriched by different salts, needs only to be scratched on the surface, before sowing the different crops."

As Dr. Kadulle descends the Nile he takes no notice of the traffic passing up and down its stream: and, of course, he could see but very little of what belonged to laud communication. Here is one short notice, however, of the characteristic dealings of the country.

"May 12th.—A troop of some 50 Nubians are now passing along the bank; men, women, and children, on their way to the slave market of Calut. I should not have suspected the nature of the cavalcade, had I not been informed of it. They are traveling easily, and merrily along, and all seem in good condition, and mostly young; the women are naked to the waist. Some Turks ahead, and behind, the slave merchants, are smoking their pipes, with the quiet air arising from a good conscience, one could say. Dreadful as the tearing of these poor people from homes is, slavery in the East, is usually not a state of great hardship. The slaves are mostly employed in domestic offices, and are considered as part of the family, and are often more the freemen of the Romans—though the girls are too often left up for prostitution.

"My indignation fills me, when these things take place before my very eyes. But how long is it, since a "Guinea trader" was thought no disgrace to a family? And the Rev. Mr. Newton, though delighting in his "soubriquet" of the "old African biographer;" never breathes a regret, at having carried off ship loads of these unfortunate from their country and homes. So very little are we removed from the deepest barbarism of feelings."

We have quoted this passage the more readily to correct the misconception respecting Mr. Newton. It is true that that venerable man, whose memory is affectionately honoured by all who honour sterling piety and good sense, continued to be the commander of a slave after there is reason to believe he had become a pious man. But it was afterwards a constant wonder to himself, how he could have done so: and no one more earnestly than he desired that the accursed traffic, in which he had been engaged, should be abolished. He was one of the first witnesses who came before the House of Commons to expose its atrocities; and we have now before us an Abstract of the testimony brought forward in 1791, of which his depositions form an important part.

The following is another view of the people of Mahomet Ali:

"15th May.—Pyramids of Sakhara in sight; twenty miles off. They look very sufficient hills at this distance, and those of Gizeh, opposite Cairo, are still larger. The country instead of improving, on approaching the capital, is evidently more neglected, and less populous. Large tracts of land, within the influence of the yearly inundation, lie quite uncultivated. The misérable "fellahs," are here more easily clothed by the Turkish culture which gnaws their vitals. Mahomet Ali has taken the greater part of the husbandmen to prosecute his senseless conquests in Arabia and Syria; and it is a horrible fact, that almost the only able bodied men left, are those who have mutilated themselves to escape the conscription. Drawing the upper front teeth, is the common disfigurement, as they are disqualified from kicking off the end of the cartridge. But sailors, and workmen in the docks, do not need teeth, and if they would avoid Seylla, as well as Charybdis, they must part with some more valuable member; a fore-finger of the right hand, or an eye. One of my boatmen has chopp'd off two joints of his fore finger, and two of them want an eye, willfully destroyed. I thought this had been exaggerated, but these are the only terms, on which the powerful labourer can escape being made food for gunpowder. So that a healthy frame, Nature's choicest blessing, is here converted into the greatest evil. Mahomet Ali, is only a Turk, after all; an energetic, and talented one, but irrational, and pig-headed on many important points of political economy, and obstinate in prosecuting false theories. He has literally the peaceful command of all the money of Arabia, if he chose to receive it, in exchange for his grain; Arabia yielding scarcely any. But with the greed of a grasping merchant, (his original trade) and a tyrant's lust for conquest, he is attempting to conquer Arabia, that he may traffic in her goods, and coffee, and raise armies from her hardy inhabitants. Even if conquered, Arabia could never pay the cost of occupation by an army. But the Arabs are saving him this expense, as they cut off ten thousand men in a night attack, when I was in Jeddah; though his troops are perfectly armed, and disciplined by Fregeh. This, and other trains he has lost, will probably blow him up. His microcosm, far more, must be made independent of foreign assistance, and by his exertions, is to be made great, and flourishing in arms, agriculture, and manufactures. His raw material, and pay for his armies must be derived from agriculture, and yet he has cut it up by the roots; raising one hundred thousand men, from a population of two millions, and all husbandmen. He takes the whole produce of Egypt from the growers, at what he calls a remunerating price, and realises seven per cent. by re-selling it himself; and no peasant dare wear a cotton shirt without the government stamp being upon it, to show that it has been manufactured by the Pacha. All people of untried trades, and shop-keepers are subjected to a poll tax "ad libitum," and every tree it taxed a pleasure. Such is robbery, when made by the wolf, for the sheep."

We shall conclude our extracts with a notice of the Pacha himself. It is true to the life, we believe; but certainly it is not flattering.

"The old gentleman is affecting to exclude himself from the vulgar gaze; and dislikes being made a lion of.

"I had seen as much as I desired of him, in the misery of his people, but as it would be "bad taste," to leave Egypt without seeing Mahomet Ali, I went one evening to the public Divan, where he usually comes at sun-set, to transact business, from his harem. There he talks with the merchants, and settles the prices of the markets. After waiting some time, I was going off, when I saw him riding across the yard, surrounded by his courtiers, on foot. I waiting at the foot of the stair, and uncovered (very unwillingly) as he past; he stooped, and bowed in return. He is a venerable looking old man, with a white beard, and dressed in plain olive coloured cloth, with a red skull cap on his head.

"I had studied a characteristic bust of him in the palace before. He has a very marked, and by no means an agreeable countenance. Two great knobs of flesh above the eyebrows, when brought together, must be rather unkind to the eye-standard, the nose is large, coarse and sensual, and the whole expression very harsh and stern. This countenance is the most sober and imaginable; the Turks at present, affecting the "sober cut" in every day dress, and in that ugly skull-cap, the most consummate aristocrat could not be sure of not being taken for the common play of humanity. The Pacha's gallantry is not to be affected, by the loss of the treasury; he has just dispatched his fine new steamer, the Aïde, to Candia, to bring cherries for the harem—

"charming old man!" cry the ladies. All his public works are useful, and creditable, but one at a time is enough for a state with greater resources than his; but his eager ambition and vanity lead him to accumulate more undertakings on his shoulders than he can bear; Atlas though he think himself. His all-sufficiency, is what he prides himself upon, and he is not known to walk by the advice of any one; though he keeps a council, to do dirty work, taking the credit for any good himself. His prime minister, Bogos Bey, it may be supposed, does not often chafe the lion by opposition, after having been once buffed for the Nile. Some friends changed his destination, to a hiding place, on shore. It was not long before his master missed a useful servant; and on meeting with some vexation, he exclaimed, "this would not have happened had Bogos been here." A friend of the drowned minister thereupon hinted, that if his highness was pleased to re-call his defunct minister to life again, it was not impossible but that Bogos might again re-visit the pale glimpses of the moon. His highness, being pleased to desire the resurrection of his minister, Bogos was unbagged, and re-instated in favor; but those who had saved him, were immediately executed—what a comfort it is, to live under a "strong government!" Another story of Turkish justice is told of the Dufferdar Bey, (the Treasurer) Mahomet Ali's son-in-law. His horse going lame one day, when he was mounted, the farrier was called, who acknowledged that the horse had been pricked in shoeing. "How long have you been in my service," asked the First Lord of the Treasury; "twenty-five years," replied the Farrier. "And in that time you have not learned to shoe a horse? I will teach you," said his kind master. "Let two horse shoes be nailed to his feet!"

CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY.—We are glad to hear of the formation of this Society, and have placed the account of the meeting for its establishment, as well as the rules adopted for its guidance, amongst our selections. The Society is wanted exceedingly. Such books as it proposes to furnish are not to be had, but in very irregular and meagre supplies; and hence it is impossible to carry on the seminaries in which they are used with systematic order and efficiency. Those Seminaries are daily increasing in number. They comprise most of the Schools for general Native education which are not supported by Government, the Seminaries for educating Native Christian Youth, of which there are now one or more in connection with every Mission in the country, and also a number of the Schools for our Anglo-Indian youth. And the demand for such books is not confined to Schools. There are many well disposed persons, in all parts of the country, who find great pleasure in taking intelligent Native youths by the hand, and encouraging them to seek higher attainments than they have acquired in School, and to give their attention to the objects most of all worthy of their regard, the solemn and animating interests of religion. Persons of this benevolent character are to be found, we are convinced, in no small number, amongst those who have a share in the direction of the Government Schools. They may hold the opinion, as we do, that it is not fit the Government should take part in the promulgation of the gospel, by teaching it in their Schools. It is a work too sacred for them to meddle with; which they would only mar by attempting to perform. At the same time, the persons we allude to are impressed with the paramount importance of religious instruction, and would be glad, as supplementary to their efforts in conducting the Government Schools, in their private capacity, to put in circulation such books as the new Society will furnish.

With these views, we regret that the founders of the Christian School Book Society, instead of justifying their undertaking by existing exigencies, should have thought it necessary to go upon the low principle which we have on former occasions shown to be so mischievously at work in the Society at home—we may call it the satagenistic principle. In order to excite interest in this Society, it is pitted against a particular party, if not against a rival institution; and by this means prejudice is awakened against it as well as zeal in its favour; and the zeal, with which its cause is espoused, is liable to be tainted deeply with the impurities of passion. We trust, however, the Society will work itself out of this danger.

In the Rules of the Society we see much to encourage the hope of its usefulness. There is only one point on which we would suggest a caution. It is the provision for putting the Society's publications at the lowest possible price, and, at least occasionally, bestowing them gratuitously. Now, unless care be taken, the immediate tenacity of such a course will be to keep out of the market all similar books, except those of the Society. It is not every competent author who would wish to fetter himself by publishing through a Society; and no one having the will and ability to write really valuable books of education should be hindered by the monopolist privileges of a great Society. The public would be losers by his loss, however much it might at first sight appear to be otherwise. Perhaps, we may be allowed to add, that it would be more consistent with the Christian character of the Society, religiously to avoid reprints. Unless the express consent of the original publisher is obtained, they are not only dishonourable to the last degree, but fraudulent and illegal. But the founders of the Society could not have contemplated reprints of such a character, and we fear we are becoming over cautious.

THE TUTUCOREN POLL-TAX.—In another page we have inserted the Petition of the Tutucoren Roman Catholic Christians to Lord Elphinstone, respecting the iniquitous exaction to which they are subjected for being Christians, and the still more iniquitous torture by which it is enforced. We do not call attention to it from any idea that there is the slightest need for supporting its prayer. If the representation of the petitioners be at all correct, we believe their grievances only need to be stated to have a remedy. With all their idolatry-loving propensities, we could not do Government the injustice of suspecting them capable of deliberately perpetuating as above like this. And the personal character of Lord Elphinstone must equally shield him from the suspicion of his becoming a party to such a course. We do call attention to the affair merely as it affords a sample of the many singular inheritances we have come into by obtaining possession of India. There are things nearly as strange in most parts of the country.

The Calcutta Christian Advocate by its open attack upon the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church, has called into birth a new paper, styled the Bengal Catholic Examiner, of which we have been favoured with the first number. It is published by the Catholic community in Calcutta, under the auspices of the Vicar Apostolic. As it forms no part of our plan to enter upon doctrinal discussions, we trust the conductors of that paper will excuse our alluding to it further than to return our best thanks for the courtesy to which we are indebted for the perusal of it.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JULY 4.

A letter from Allahabad, published in the Agra Ubbor, states that a report prevails that a renewed attempt is to be made to get up a newspaper at Allahabad; and that it is to be conducted by the Missionaries there. Allahabad certainly presents as uninviting a field for a newspaper as any place of the same magnitude under this Presidency.—The intelligence from Joudhpore is of a warlike character. Col. Sutherland has been obliged to break off all intercourse with the Rajah, Man Singh, after having ascertained his pacific intentions, by returning to the negotiation four, or five more times. He has now dismissed the Envoy of the Chief, and returned his letters promising to pay up the arrears of tribute; and declared that the merchants passing through his territories will no longer be considered as under the protection of the British Government. Unless a very decisive change of sentiment should take place in the mind of the Rajah, a British force will march against him, when the rains are over, and deep snow lies. Such a lesson would produce a salutary effect throughout Rajpootana.—A singular trial has just come off in the Supreme Court. A poor wretch living in a hut, and deriving a precarious living by selling old glass, brought on action against a wealthy and honourable Native merchant for a sum a little under five hundred Rupees, and produced a Promissory Note which he said had been signed by the defendant. The story was ably cut up by the evidence of the defendant's witnesses; but there was the bond, with a hieroglyphic signature, which no man, not even Mr. Blackmore, was able to decipher. At length, a clerk in the Post Office was brought forward, who was acquainted with the character in which it was said to have been written, and who on looking at it, said that it was no signature or word at all; that the initial characters were a a a, and the final without meaning. The fraud was thus discovered, and the case dismissed.

FRIDAY, JULY 5.

The Bombay dawk has now been due for two days; and as this is the period at which the Overland Mail may be expected, we naturally conclude that it has arrived at Bombay, and may be hourly expected. Strange, though it may seem, it is no less true, that the approach of our Steam Mail is indicated by the detention of the post three, four and five days beyond the usual time.—Letters have been received from Bankok. Dr. Richardson having completely failed in the objects of his mission at the Court of Siam, quitted it on the 19th March, on his return to Moulemein. The cause of his failure is the supposed premeditation of Burmese over British power.—The accounts which have arrived from Amersport, state that no alteration had taken place in the treatment of the British Envoy at the Court of Tharravaddie; and that three of the King's sons had been appointed each to the command of an army, with orders to march to the southern provinces. This intelligence appears to have excited some sensation at Moulemein; where it is considered as an indication of the warlike intentions of the King. The entertainments at Moulemein have nothing, however, to fear from any attack which all the King's horses or all the King's men might make on it.—Letters have been received from Brigadier Sale, who was sent in pursuit of the Candahar Chiefs to Girkick. Both that place and Sadush were taken possession of without opposition. Kohan Dill Khan, previous to his flight, destroyed all the boats on the Helmand river, and carried away the gates and wood from the fort, to prevent the construction of rafts. But the rumour of the detachment were brought into play, and the troops crossed without difficulty.—The Bank of Bengal has just declared a dividend of eight per cent., a result which has not a little disappointed the shareholders.—At the last meeting of the Asiatic Society, a most extraordinary proposal was brought forward by a learned foreigner, Baron Bessin, for establishing a regular communication between this country and every part of the world, by means of an electric telegraph. Particulars are given among our selections.

SATURDAY, JULY 6.

The Overland Mail reached Calcutta about four o'clock this day. We have given in a subsequent column a précis of the intelligence brought by this opportunity.

SUNDAY, JULY 8.

The Nymph has just arrived from China, which she left on the 13th May. She adds little or nothing to our former intelligence. The delivery of 20,000 sheets had been completed. Nothing further is said regarding the stoppage of the trade by the British Superintendent.—Letters have been received from Bankok, where the Government has followed closely in the footsteps of the Emperor of China, and peremptorily ordered all the Opium to be delivered up. About five hundred chests had been surrendered, and the holders had been obliged to give up the names of the individuals from whom the drug had been purchased, and thus became acquainted with all the mysteries of the trade; which it is intended by one vigorous effort to crush.—Two situations in the Union Bank are now vacant; that of Mr. Storm, the Secretary, who has gone into the house of Stewart, Mackillop and Co.; and of Mr. Sim, the Chief Assistant in that establishment.—Sir Henry Fane, it is stated, does not return to England till December next. The Court of Directors have, it is said, experienced no little difficulty in obtaining the services of another Commander-in-Chief.—Government has determined that no postage shall be levied on letters sent by the Water Witch to Aden; she is to be considered in the light of a Steamer.

THURSDAY, JULY 9.

The papers brought by the last Overland Mail state, that Lord Clare, the former Governor of Bombay, intended to extend his travels from Egypt to the scene of his former authority.—Sir John Ardry has been sworn in as Chief Justice at Bombay.—The latest accounts from Afghanistan state, that Dost Mahomed has thrown into confinement his own officer, Col. Campbell, an American officer now in his service, and one of his own Sirdars, because they were suspected of being friendly to the English.—We are happy to learn that the University of Edinburgh has conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity on the Rev. Mr. Charles, the Senior Presbyterian Clergyman in Calcutta.—The presents of Elephants from this Government to the Pasha of Egypt has been received by him with great avidity, and most handsomely acknowledged.—The small detachment sent against the fugitive Chiefs at Girkick, were expected back at Candahar on the 27th May. The troops were suffering greatly from sickness and want of provisions. It was, however, hoped, that the encampment would break up at the beginning of June, and that the troops would march towards Ghizni. Dost Mahomed will, probably, be placed hors de combat by the Sikh troops, and the desertion of his own chiefs, and leave the troops nothing to do. The army is without an enemy; and the enemy without an army. The siege train guns, &c., which were intended for Herat, would, it is said, be left for the present at Candahar; but Major Toild, Mr. Macnaghten's Secretary, and Capt. Abbott, were on the eve of starting for Herat, on a political mission to Shah Kamran.—The news from Rangoon is not warlike. Tharravaddie is collecting the armaments of war, (the Burmese have been doing this since the treaty of Yandaboo,) and assembling troops, but he will not come to the scratch, if he can help it, till he fancies he can perceive our throne tottering, and then he will not be our only foe.—The Steamer Satellite, consigned to Messrs. Bruce, Sland and Co., of Calcutta, left Scotland, we hear, on the 2d April last.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10.

The papers of the week state, with confidence, that the Sudder Nazamut Adawlut has refused the application of the soi-disant Portuguese Chand for a new trial.—It is stated on the authority of letters from Smyrna, that the Shah of Persia has prohibited the importation of British goods into his territories.—The Madras Steam line, in support of the Comprehensive Plan, we are happy to say, has now reached four hundred and forty shares, making a contribution of two lakhs and twenty thousand Rs.—The Englishman extracts from the Times of the 12th of April, a notice of the death of Mr. Henry Davis, who accumulated a large fortune, as an indigo planter, and has lived for many years a life of strict seclusion in England. His fortune of 95,000*l.* devolves on his two sons, now in Bengal.—Our own letters from England received by the last Mail, give the most lamentable accounts of the health of Mr. James Prinsep. Our correspondent says, that he is so dangerously ill, that no one is allowed to see him. It is to be sincerely hoped that the May Mail, which may be very shortly expected, will bring more favourable accounts of his state.—Mr. W. Adam, so well known in Calcutta, has assisted in the formation of a Society for improving the condition of the people of India, of which we are happy to see that Mr. Montgomery Martin does not form a member. Whatever may be Mr. Adam's views of the conduct of Government, we have such confidence in the honour of his character as to believe, that he will never allow a misstatement to be promulgated under the sanction of his name.—The state of the crops in the Western Provinces is becoming more and more alarming. A renewed draught has depressed the hopes of the husbandmen, and the prospect of another famine appears too proximate.

SUMMARY OF EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

The long expected Mail arrived on Saturday afternoon last, having been brought to Bombay by a sailing vessel, the Columbia, and not by the steamer which waits for the May Mail, which may be expected before the close of the present week. The intelligence now received extends to the 25th of April.

The great contest for place between Whigs and Tories, which was brought on by Lord John Russell's determination to take the peace of the House of Commons on the Irish Policy of the Ministry, was decided in favour of the Whigs, after a debate of five nights, by a Majority of Twenty-two. The majority is small; but since the new balance of power established by the Reform Bill, it is to be doubted whether any Ministry will be able to command much larger majorities on a party question. Lord John Russell's conduct in seizing the opportunity afforded by Lord Roden's enquiry in the Lords, to call upon the Commons for a vote of confidence in Ministers, ostensibly upon the brightest spot in the Administration, their Irish policy, but really upon their general conduct, displays that nerve, and tact, and firmness, which so eminently fit him to take the lead in public affairs. The Ministry are now in quiet possession of their seats till the next session.

The publication of the papers connected with the affairs of Afghanistan in London, appears to have given a new turn to public opinion. Lord Auckland's conduct is thereby placed in the most advantageous light. The most important of these documents, are the notes of explanation which have passed between the Russian and English Cabinets. "Under whatever disguise the designs of Russia may be concealed, it is evident from them, that her ambition stretched to the acquisition of an influence up to the Indus. She has endeavoured to extend her connections into Afghanistan; the meaning of which cannot be misunderstood. There can be little doubt that she is willing to break with England, whenever she is ready for the rupture. England is in the way of her career to a general Slavonian monarchy, and will not be forgiven. Whether she is really now in another question. An English fleet of ten sail of the line has been ordered up the Baltic, of course to watch the Russian fleet. The Emperor has caused Prince Paskovitch to take the command of the Asar of Tsar East with unusual pomp; and more may be meant in this than the attack on Circassia. Count Nesselrode, who opposed a war with England, is said to have been dismissed; and there is a rumour that overtures have been made to Austria, to join Russia, in case of a war with England. These movements look warlike.

The Egyptian and Turkish armies, after having faced each other for some time, are said to have mutually retrograded. The cause of this war is singular. The Sultan, some months back, sent an envoy privately to Mahomed Ali, to propose a settlement of their differences. He was then in Upper Egypt, and replied that he should not be back for several months. The Sultan interpreted this into an intentional insult, and mighty preparations were immediately made by sea and land to crush the refractory Viceroy. Russia, England and France have united in endeavouring to restore peace; but in vain; and in the attempt England seems to have lost ground with both parties; for the Porte has sent away, with contempt, the English officers who had been invited to improve the Turkish fleet; and Mahomet Ali has begun to throw impediments in the way of our Steam Communication through Egypt. If the two armies should come to blows, the European powers can scarcely avoid being drawn into a war; the end of which no one can foresee.

Nothing farther has transpired respecting the American boundary line dispute. The warlike ferour of brother Jonathan appears to have cooled a little, as the consequences of a war with Britain were contemplated with more calmness. It was not determined whether a Special Minister should be sent from Washington to London, or not, but it appears to be the policy of Mr. Van Buren's Cabinet to avoid a war, if possible; and as it is equally the interest of both countries to keep the peace to each other, there is hope that it may be maintained.

The project for sending a Steamer round the Cape has been abandoned; but the Steam prospects by way of the Red Sea do not look brighter. Parliament has voted 50,000*l.* for this object, but the Court of Directors still continue to withhold their cordial support.

Dr. McNeill has been invested with the Grand Cross of the Bath. The Persian Ambassador, with rich presents for the Queen, has reached Paris, but Lord Palmerston has intimated to him that he will not be received at Court.

Recruiting for H. M.'s regiments in India was going forward with zeal, and men of five-feet-five-and-a-half inches were received.

A French Ministry has been formed, ad interim, in the probability of which no one has any confidence.

A Bill has been brought in to suspend the Legislature of Jamaica.

Mr. Ga't, the popular writer, is dead. The Archbishop of Tuam is also dead, and his see will be absorbed in Kildare.

PRECIS OF RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Having been happily favoured with the receipt of all our English papers, for the first time, by the post of one day, we are enabled to put into execution a long cherished plan of furnishing our readers with a precis of the intelligence they contain; and as the information is chiefly of a religious character, and lies in a different direction from that which is furnished by our daily contemporaries, we think it will not be uninteresting to a number of our friends.

Dr. John Pyc Smith has been delivering a series of lectures in London, on the subject of popular Geology, the object of which is to reconcile the inductions of that science with the facts of Scripture. The Herknott's London Correspondent, H. T. has fully committed him self, when, in allusion to these lectures in defence of the Scriptures, by one of the most celebrated characters among the Dissenters of the present age, he says, a Dr. Pyc Smith, a Minister of the Established Church, has been giving a series of lectures in London on Geology, in which the facts of Scripture are treated with little ceremony.

A curious anecdote, in reference to the Church of Scotland, is related of Lord Brougham. The celebrated appeal case of the Presbytery of Auchenarder came on in appeal before the Lords. Sir Frederick Pollock appeared for the Presbytery; and in the course of his speech, made some remark which the opposing Council, Sir John Campbell, replied to in an under tone. Sir Frederick complained of the interruption, when Lord Brougham exclaimed, "The Church of Scotland is founded on a rock; the gates of hell shall not prevail against it—much less the wiles of Her Majesty's Attorney General."

A public meeting was held in London, on the 27th March, to promote a Comprehensive Scheme of National Education, upon the basis of the Holy Scriptures. It was evidently a Dissenting assembly; and hence no clergymen of the Established Church were present, though not a few benevolent and religious laymen of that communion assisted to establish it. It was on this meeting, opposed as it was to the exclusive doctrine of associating national education with the Establishment, on which the Times has been so lavish of its censure in the article, which begins— "The clerical ladies, and unglorified brethren, whose burning piety shed a sweet a savour over that meeting, must be presumed to be almost well acquainted with the Whigs as with their Bibles."

The Committee of the Christian Instruction Society have made arrangements for commemorating, at the Tabernacle, Moorfields, on Whit Tuesday, the 21st May, the centenary of the first efforts of Whitfield to preach in the fields and streets of the metropolis.

The Princess Augusta of Cambridge, who will attain her 18th year in July next, was confirmed at the Chapel Royal, at the end of March. At the conclusion of the service, the Queen embraced her royal cousin, and presented her with a Bible, splendidly bound, in commemoration of the event.

The Prussian Government has ordered judicial proceedings to be instituted against another Catholic Prelate, the Bishop of Culm, because of his having, in imitation of his colleagues at Cologne and Posen, published a pastoral letter, enjoining his clergy in all cases of mixed marriages, to conform to the orders of the Sovereign Pontiff, and not to the laws of the land.

Eleven Bishops have addressed the Archbishop of Canterbury, entreating him to withdraw any sanction he may have given to the Bill for reducing the Cathedral Establishments. It is this Bill which those two prime spirits of the age, Albany Fortmanque and Sydney Smith have been for some time engaged in discussing. It is said that the Bill will be opposed by no less than eighteen prelates in the Lords.

By a return lately made to Parliament, it appears that the total cost to the East India Company of the Church Establishment, for the year 1836, was 85,705*l*. This does not include the some paid for building or repairing Churches, or the sum of 7,310*l*. defrayed at home for pensions and furlough allowances.

A statement regarding the consumption of spirituous liquors in New South Wales, is given in these papers. It is truly appalling. In the year 1836, there were,—deducting children,—63,925 consumers; and the direct revenue from spirits, amounted to 1,27,057*l*.; shewing that every male and female throughout the entire territory of N. S. Wales, above twelve years of age, paid on an average two pounds sterling in direct taxation for ardent spirits. The revenue from spirits in 1836, was 136,521*l*.; the revenue from every other source, 61,597*l*.

A Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery and the Slave Trade throughout the world, by moral, religious and other influences, is about to be formed in London. The fearful disclosures in Mr. Buxton's book, of the rapid increase of the slave trade, during the last half century, from 30,000 annually, to 200,000, has aroused public indignation.

Mr. Knilb has purchased a large tract of land in Jamaica from funds furnished by an Association in London, which is to be laid out for a town, under the style of New Birmingham. The Capital of this Company is 100,000*l*., of which one-half has been subscribed up.

The Wesleyan Centenary Fund, at the date of our latest accounts, amounted to 192,000*l*. It was at one time expected to reach a quarter of a million, but the public zeal begins to flag.

Dr. Wardlaw has been pitted against Dr. Chalmers, on the subject of establishments, and has come to London, where he will deliver a series of eight lectures on National Church Establishment. The Times, which puffed up Dr. Chalmers to the skies, designates his opponent, the Glasgow 'blood-greener.'

The Bishop of London, it is said, has been applied to, to revise the whole of the Psalmsody used throughout his diocese, with the view of establishing one uniform system.

Her Majesty's Ministers have declared their intention not to renew the Patent of Queen's Printer in Scotland, which expires on the 17th July, but to bring in a Bill for securing the accurate printing of Bibles.

It is a remarkable fact that at the late Assizes, there was not one case of crime from Salford, and only two from Manchester. We are informed at the same time, that no fewer than seven courses of lectures are now in course of delivery in that city, from that of the Four Laws to the beauties of Hebrew Poetry.

A large and comprehensive Society, composed of all denominations, and called the RELIGIOUS FELLOWSHIP SOCIETY, was to hold its first anniversary on the 3d of May. The Chairman is our old friend, Charles Lushington, Esq., sometime Chief Secretary in Calcutta.

The Church-rate contest has, we see, begun in Heckney. No less than fifteen hundred summonses have been issued by the Parish authorities for the recovery of Church-rates.

The Quarterly Review has given in its adhesion to the Oxford Theology. The following is a memorable sentence for the 19th century. "If the State is to be preserved, all soo it must be preserved by the Church. But if the Church is made to hang on the State with no authority of its own; if its power is rooted on the plea of expediency, or the will of its subjects, it must fall for ever."

The Queen has appointed the Reverend Thomas Grylls to the vacant Deanery of Exeter, and the Chapter have refused to accept him. Mr. Grylls is an excellent preacher, an exemplary divine,—but he supported Sir Hussey Vivyan at the last Cornish election.

The late Mr. Hammond has made the following bequests:—British and Foreign Bible Society, 10,000*l*.; Protestant Dissenters' Widows' Society, 8,000*l*.; London Missionary Society, 3000*l*.; Congregational Fund Board, 2,000*l*.; Poetry Chapel

Institution, 2,000*l*.; Homerton College, 1,000*l*.; Hibernian Society, 1,000*l*.; Irish Evangelical Society, 500*l*.; Congregational School, 500*l*.; London City Mission, 500*l*.; Orphan Working School, 500*l*.; Strangers' Friend Society, 500*l*.; total, 38,000*l*. The residue, which amounts to between thirty and forty thousand pound is to be divided in equal shares between the four first-mentioned societies.

"The following curious label appears on a perfume recently introduced into Oxford. We have not yet heard which member of the Poseyric School has had the honour of introducing this preparation from Rome. It may be considered more innocent than many of their other recent importations. "Frankincense, for the fumigating of apartments, prepared in exact accordance with the celebrated incense used at St. Peter's, Rome. Sold by Her Majesty's Perfumers, Spicers and Son, Oxford. This frankincense is intended to be used in an incense-burner."

On December 29th, Frederick Lucas, Esq., of the Middle Temple, barrister-at-law, abjured the tenets of the Quakers, and embraced the Roman Catholic faith. The conversions to the Roman Catholic communion, annually, in England, are computed to be about 2,000.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE TETTERGREEN POLL-TAX.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN, LORD ELMHURST, C. C. H., GOVERNOR, &c. &c. OF FORT ST. GEORGE AND ITS DEPENDENCIES.

The humble Petition of the undersigned Parawa Traders of Tutuoreen, in the district of Tenetilly in the Madras Presidency, but now residing at Colombo in the Island of Ceylon.

Humble Sheweth,—That the Petitioners take the liberty to approach your Excellency and lay before you the grievances under which their body labour: In the fullest confidence of redress, both from your Excellency's inherent humanity and love of justice, and from the equity which has invariably characterised the paternal Rule of the British Government in India, of which your Lordship is fortunately at present the Representative in their native presidency.

That in addition to all the other taxes levied at Tutuoreen (and which the Petitioners pay as punctually and willingly as any other class there.) Your Excellency's Petitioners, are subject to a personal tax—a Poll-tax—as your Lordship on enquiry from the Local Authorities may be ascertained, which varies from 1*l*. to 7 Rupees per annum, and is levied on all—both men and women—between the ages of 16 and 60 years.

That the Petitioners' estate, from time immemorial have been professors of the Roman Catholic Religion; and learn from Tradition that this tax—a Poll-tax, was originally imposed by their native Heathen Rulers as a means of persecuting their faith. And your Excellency's Petitioners would fain hope that it is perpetuated by the British Government owing to a want of due representation; for, although not intended it still retains its persecuting nature, particularly from the mode in which it is collected.

That this Poll-tax (objectionable in itself by being levied on the Petitioners' Christian claim alone, whilst all others are entirely free from it) is rendered still more obnoxious from being collected by Heathens, whose hostility to Christianity is avowed. These Heathens in the first instance have the assessment of the tax, when an opportunity is afforded them of gratifying the private pique they may happen to entertain against any individual Parawa, as well as their deep-rooted animosity against the entire Christian body. These tax gatherers, in the collection of this impost, resort moreover to the most cruel methods to extract it, and without any consideration of the circumstances of the poor persons from whom they make the demand. The tax is frequently collected on Sundays as your Petitioners are on their way to or from Divine Worship, when they are stopped, and whatever money they may have about their persons is forcibly taken from them; and if considered necessary, the Heathen tax gatherer and his sons use their whips and sticks to enforce submission. Your Excellency's Petitioners are of a trading class, and in search of livelihood travel to foreign countries; and during their absence, their houses are frequently entered by the tax gatherers, their women ill-treated, and their furniture, clothes, and even doors and windows are carried off to pay the demand.

The Petitioners will not trespass on your Excellency's attention by detailing the many other cruelties practised upon them in the collection of this POLL-TAX: but conclude by assuring your Lordship that actual Torture is resorted to:—Yes, Your Excellency will doubtless shudder when you hear, but it nevertheless is true, that when all minor cruelties are unavailing, the Thumb Screw, and standing in the burning sun with a heavy stone upon the shoulders, are the means used by the Heathens of Tutuoreen, acting under the authority of the Honourable the E. I. Company's Christian Government, to extract the POLL-TAX from the persecuted Christian Parasas.

Under these most deplorable circumstances the petitioners most humbly approach your Excellency, and pray that their body at Tutuoreen may be altogether exempted from the POLL-TAX under which they groan—and which both in its nature and consequences they believe to be without parallel in the British dominions,—for even the Heathen Pilgrim taxes of Juggerswath and Gya have been abolished. An act, which, though perhaps of tardy justice, your Excellency's Petitioners will not fail to acknowledge as of the greatest clemency; nor yet, as Christians, for your Lordship's health, happiness and spiritual blessing, as well as for the advancement of British interests and the Christian Religion throughout India, will, your Excellency's Petitioners, as in duty bound ever cease to pray.—United Service Gazette, June 18.

THE NATIVE CHRISTIAN PROTECTION SOCIETY.

It having been frequently a question with the Missionaries of the different Societies, how to deal with cases of oppression practised upon Native Christians, members of their Churches, by zemindars and mahajans, but especially the former; and the matter having of late been discussed more fully than heretofore, in consequence both of the accumulating instances of such oppression and of the frequent applications made to some of them for protection and aid—it was agreed, at the Monthly Missionary Meeting of the Missionaries, held on the 1st Tuesday in April last, to form a Provisional Committee for taking the entire subject into detailed consideration, with a view to ascertain what measures might be adopted for protecting Native Christians from wrong, without either fostering worldliness and litigiousness in them, or departing from the strict line of Missionary obligation by entering upon a province not belonging to their own spiritual designation.

The Committee consists of the following gentlemen: Rev. Messrs. Gogery, Lacroix, Piffard, Mack, Macdonald, Aratoon, and Morton, the last being also the Secretary.

At a Meeting held on Monday, 1st May last, the Provisional Committee agreed—

1. That many instances have occurred, are yet occurring, and may be expected still more frequently to occur, of great oppression and manifest injustice practised by zemindars and mahajans upon Native Christians as such, and therefore fully meriting to be called cases of religious persecution; whilst others have arisen out of their Christian profession, as, e. g. in reference to Sabbath labour, supposed peccableness, &c.

2. That from the timidity, poverty, and defencelessness of the Native Christians of the villages generally, it is nearly impossible for them to defend themselves from such oppression and injustice without the aid of Missionary or other European patronage.

3. That, on the other hand, there must always be a danger, in attempting to prevent oppression, of unwittingly encouraging professing Native Christians in resistance to just claims and disregard of clear obligations; that there must ever, indeed, be this double danger in a state of society such as is that of the present rural population of Bengal.

4. That the individual or combined interference in aid of their converts, even in the clearest cases of direct injustice, of Missionaries as such, is in all respects unadvisable; whether we regard the probable inducement to a false and interested profession of Christianity, on the one hand, so preventing itself; or the diversion of Missionary time and energy from the proper and direct line of their spiritual calling, on the other.

5. That the Provisional Committee recommended, therefore, that measures be taken for the formation of a Society to be designated the Native Christian Protection Society, as hereby called for in the present exigence.

It was resolved in consequence to reannumerate,

1st. That all persons subscribing to its funds be members of the projected Society.

2nd. That the Society be under the management of a Committee, consisting of at least one Missionary from each Missionary Society, together with six lay members.

3rd. That the following suggestions respecting matters of detail, be offered to the consideration of any permanent Committee which may be appointed by the projected Society, or of its members at large.

1st. That no case of alleged oppression be entertained, except from bona fide enumerating members of the several Churches.

2nd. That no case be entertained which may have occurred prior to the formation of this Society.

3rd. That no case be entertained which may have occurred previously to the complainant's having become a communicating member of a Christian Church.

4th. That no case be taken into consideration unless first recommended by the Pastor of the Church of which the complainant is a member, or the Missionary with whom he stands connected; and that no case be received from any person belonging to a Church whose Pastor is not a member of this Society.

5th. That no case be carried into Court, unless supported by the sanction of at least two-thirds of the Committee in attendance, after having been specially summoned for the occasion.

6th. That if the complainant possesses the means of defraying the law expenses incurred with his case, he shall bind himself to the Committee to repay the same, in whole or in part, at their discretion.

7th. That any case which may be recommended to the Society, though perfectly good at first and actually entered upon, be at once thrown up if it be proved that, during its progress, improper means have been used to ensure success, by the party whose cause is advocated by the Society.

8th. That if at any time deception be practised on the Society, and through that deception a case be supported by the Society in Court, and in the course of judicial inquiry or otherwise the deception become apparent to the satisfaction of the Committee, such deceiving party be for ever after deprived of any benefit which the Society may be able to afford; or if at any time the Committee should be inclined to depart from the severity of this law, it can only be after a sufficient period of probation, and, it shall possess a strong renewed confidence in the party.

Lastly, That subscription books, containing a Prospectus of the Society and the above string of resolutions, signed by all the Missionaries and Ministers who desire to become members of the Society, be immediately sent abroad among the Laity of Calcutta and its vicinity.—Cal. Christ. Observer.

FORMATION OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY.

The meeting for the formation of a Christian School-Book Society, was held at the Town Hall, on Thursday morning, the 30th June, at half-past 9 o'clock. The Meeting though not large, was respectably attended. J. A. F. Hawkins, Esq. C. S. in the chair. The Meeting was opened with prayer, by the Rev. J. Charles of the Scottish Church. The Chairman, in opening the proceedings of the Meeting, said, he was happy in having an opportunity of meeting the Friends of Christian Education on the present occasion, for the formation of a Christian School-Book Society. The Society was designed to provide Christian school-books, for the youths of the country. The Society was to be based upon the Evangelical and Catholic principles of the Religious Trust Society; all Evangelical Christians would be able to unite in it, which was matter for rejoicing. He could not but look with fearful apprehension at the influence of what was designated secular education, and he felt happy in the formation of an Institution, which would have an influence in correcting the evils to which he had adverted.

The Secretary, pro. temp. then read the Prospectus and Rules of the Society; after which the Meeting was addressed by the Rev. Messrs. J. Charles, R. B. Bowell, A. F. Lacroix, F. Wybrow, T. Boaz, J. D. Ellis and W. Morton; J. W. Alexander, C. Dearle, and Wale Byrn, Esqrs.; after which, a subscription was entered into by the parties present, for the purpose of carrying into effect the object of the Institution.

We have much pleasure in presenting the Prospectus and Rules of this Society, and also the Resolutions moved at the meeting.

The following Resolutions were proposed and carried unanimously:—

Proposed by Rev. J. Charles, and seconded by Rev. R. B. Bowell;

1.—That the members of this meeting cordially approve of the sentiments regarding the importance of Christian education, expressed in the Prospectus just read; and that they adopt its principles as a just exposition of their views of the consequent importance to this land of a Christian educational literature.

Proposed by Rev. F. Wybrow, and seconded by Rev. A. F. Lacroix;

2.—That the members of this meeting, convinced of the necessity existing for an immediate, united, and active nucleus of operation to promote the simple but important object of the Prospectus, now form themselves into a Society, on the basis of the Rules just read and approved, to be designated the Calcutta Christian School-Book Society.

Proposed by Rev. J. D. Ellis, and seconded by Rev. T. Boaz;

3.—That a Committee be immediately formed to conduct the affairs of the Society, with power to appoint a Treasurer and Secretaries, and otherwise to add to their numbers.

Committee.

The Missionary Body ex-officio, the Rev. Messrs. Charles and Micklejohn, Messrs. G. Alexander, J. W. Alexander, J. A. F. Hawkins, and Wale Byrn, with power to add to their number.

Proposed by Rev. W. Morton, and seconded by Mr. J. W. Alexander;

4.—That a subscription be immediately opened, to enable the Society to carry into effect the object of its formation.

The Chairman then addressed the meeting, and concluded by expressing his satisfaction at the support they met with.

Thanks were then voted to the Chairman and the meeting dissolved.—Cal. Christ. Observer.

LAYS OR RULES OF THE "CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN SCHOOL-BOOK SOCIETY."

I. That the Society to be formed be designated the Calcutta Christian School-Book Society.

II. That the bond of the Society shall be those Christian doctrines in which the Protestant evangelical churches are agreed.

III. That the primary object of the Society shall be to obtain and furnish, in the English or Native languages, a supply of Books for promoting education on Christian principles.

IV. That, with regard to Religious School-Books, such only shall be kept by the Society as are decidedly scriptural; and such books on general science and literature, as are consistent with the word of God.

V. That the necessary supply of Books shall be obtained by the original preparation, re-publication or purchase of works suited to the object of Christian Education.

VI. That the Books provided by the Society shall be furnished at the lowest possible prices.

VII. That the Society shall retain a discretionary power, in special cases, to dispose of Books at reduced rates.

VIII. That the Society shall also use its influence generally, for the purpose of promoting Christian Education, in such other ways as may seem best.

IX. That a General Committee for the management of the affairs of the Society, be appointed in Calcutta, with a Sub-Committee for the special charge of preparing or publishing the Books required.

X. That the agency of Local Committees throughout the country be solicited, to co-operate with the General Committee.

XI. That subscriptions for the furtherance of the Society's objects be solicited.

XII. That subscribers, to whatever amount, be considered alike members of the Society.

Such is the proposed basis of the Christian School-Book Society; and we hope, that the recital of its rules will satisfy all, as to its real nature and design. But, if there should be a still more specific inquiry made as to the class of books which we would comprehend under the designation of "Christian School-Books," we would reply;

1. Elementary works, conveying in the simplest form, in the English or Native languages, such lessons of Divine Truth and of human knowledge, as may give the earliest possible taste towards God and salvation.

2. Literary helps for more advanced classes, containing such useful compilations of Truth, Divine and Human, suited to the exigencies of this country, as may tend to exercise, sanctify, and elevate the minds of ignorant, superstitious, or infidel youth.

3. Works, scientific and philosophical, of such a kind as to warrant the confidence of Christian Teachers, will also enter into the plans of the Society's operations. Science must necessarily become the servant of Revelation, as its objects are in themselves subordinate to the God of the Bible; to secure this end in a rebel-world may be difficult; but to him that wills it truly, it is ever and certainly practicable.

4. Again, a systematic arrangement of Religious Books intended to convey Christian knowledge to the youthful mind, and the preparation of some new manuals on this subject, will form a very important part of our contemplated operations. May we not also hope, that the day is now dawning near, when the study of Christian Theology in its highest forms will hold a wide and influential place among the youthful converts of the East; and when a personal knowledge of the Original languages of Holy Scripture will be generally pursued in order to the fulfilment of a Native Christian Ministry? We may then be honoured to anticipate and supply such a demand, and so still further to promote and confirm it; and so help on, in our own little but important sphere, the approach of that blessed day when India shall be "covered with the knowledge of the Lord!"

Such is the Prospectus of our plan—further proceedings for its fulfilment, are now left in the hands of Christian Friends now assembled. May the Lord God, for whose honour this matter is intended, overrule all for good!—Cal. Christ. Observer.

LOLL BAZAR CHAPEL.

We understand the Baptist Church in Loll Bazar had unanimously invited the Rev. R. Rayne to become their Pastor, and he has acceded to their request for a time at least. Last Wednesday evening's prayer meeting was held, imploring the Divine blessing upon the connexion formed, when Mr. Parsons gave a very appropriate address.—Commercial Advertiser.

REMOVAL OF THE AMERICAN MISSION, FROM SADIYA TO JAIPUR, ASSAM.

We understand that the American Mission, formerly located at Sadiya, has been removed to Jaipur, Assam. This removal has been rendered necessary by the ruined condition of Sadiya consequent on the late insurrection. Jaipur is the headquarters of the Tea Companies' operations, and will consequently soon become an important sphere of labour. It is more central as a Mission Station than Sadiya for direct labour among the Singphos, Shyans and Nagas, and in fact better adapted for direct communication with the Assamese people generally. May the Lord bless this removal for the good of the many tribes amongst whom our brethren labour.—Cal. Christ. Adv.

ASIATIC SOCIETY'S MEETING.

The Secretary next brought to the notice of the meeting a project of a distinguished Foreigner, Baron Basin, present at the meeting, for establishing a regular communication between this country and every part of the world by means of an electrical telegraph, the intelligence to be conveyed in some situations through hydraulic tubes. Should the telegraph be established it was the inventor's expectation that a message could be sent from Calcutta to London in three quarters of an hour—(a matter of the highest importance to the merchants of this city.) It was estimated that the expense attending the erection of such a telegraph as was proposed throughout Hindostan, dividing the country into four routes, namely, in Louisiana, Nishaboon, Purneah and Decca, would be a sum of nine crores and thirty-six lakhs of rupees. The Honourable President thought the subject of too important a nature to be disposed of hastily by the present company, he would therefore propose, as it was customary to do in all such cases both by the Society and all others of a similar nature, that a committee be appointed to take the subject into their mature consideration and report on it at their next Meeting. A Committee of four persons, besides the Secretary, who offered every assistance on the occasion, were appointed; but Baron Haas was desirous, as he was shortly about to take his departure from Calcutta, that the subject should be discussed, and a decision come to summarily at the present Meeting. This not meeting with the approbation of the Honourable President or the Members, it was proposed and carried that the papers descriptive of the new telegraph be returned with the usual acknowledgments.—Cal. Courier, July 4.

EUROPE.

BELGIUM.

THE LATE BISHOP OF DORMAN'S LIBERALITY.—We learn from Parliamentary evidence, that the late Dr. Van Mildert Bishop of Durham, dispensed at least 10,000*l.* a-year in charity within his diocese. It has been shown upon the authority of Parliamentary documents also, that the average of the good Bishop's income was under 20,000*l.* a-year.—Watchman.

OVEN THIS SOCIETY has suffered a complete defeat at Worcester, where he was encountered by a clever schoolmaster of the name of Brindley, from Stourbridge. Owen stated, in conclusion, that where two young persons were united in marriage, under the most favourable and proper circumstances, "they were seduced by the priest at the altar." At this the audience burst forth voluntarily into loud exclamations of condemnation. A vote of thanks was given to Mr. Brindley, and three thanks for Owen. Owing to the excitement, it was found impossible to keep the doors against the multitude; consequently, Mr. Brindley has not only no money to pay over for charitable purposes, but has the whole of the expense of printing, advertising, lighting, the repairing of the broken furniture, &c., "devolving upon himself. On leaving the Guildhall, Owen was hoisted by the crowd until he reached his lodgings."—Christ. Adv.

FRANCE.—The French Evangelical or Home Society has existed about five years. Its expenditure, the first year, was 3900 francs; last year it was 79,000. The reports of the progress of its agents are very gratifying. At the last annual meeting it had forty-six agents, and six more, with three students, have been added within the last six months.—Gen. Engl. Rep.

At Tours, Grenoble, Nancy, Toulouse and other places, there has been a sharp, active controversy between the Catholics and Protestants, occasioned by the progress of Protestantism. Five Editions of the Reply of the Protestants of Toulouse to the censures of the Catholic Archbishop, a work of over 300 pages, have appeared within three months. The Catholics are anxious to retain their people, and the Protestants to enlighten them. The good cause is gaining ground.—Ibid.

BRITAIN.—The aspect of Protestantism is improving in this kingdom. The press, pulpit, and the school are free from legislative shackles. There is a Protestant English worship and ministers at Brussels, Ostend Spa, Tournay, Bruges, and Antwerp. The Reformed Lutheran Churches have worship in Frensch, German, or Dutch at most of the above places, and at Ghent, Liege, Douai, and other places.—Ibid.

PRUSSIA.—The population of Prussia, according to the last census, (1857) is 14,088,123, of which there are Protestants, 4,404,741; Catholics, 5,394,028; Jews, 182,578, the rest being Greeks, and especially Menonites (Baptists). The persecutions against the pure Lutherans continue; more than a hundred families have become exiles from their native land rather than submit to the spiritual yoke the king would put on them. On the other hand, the king has received the families which have been compelled by Russian intolerance to quit Austria. So inconsistent are Lords Spiritual &—Ibid.

MARRIAGES.—The Prussian Government, it is said, is about to declare marriage a civil contract, and require a civil registration of it before any clergyman gives his blessing. The right of educating their own children, independent of ecclesiastical authority, is also to be secured to the parents.—Ibid.

DENMARK.—The complete emancipation of the Jews in Denmark, according to a letter of the 14th ult. from Copenhagen, has been voted by the states of that kingdom, by a majority of 33 to 30.—Christ. Adv.

RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN HUNGARY.—There are a good many Protestants scattered through Hungary, and in these mountain districts they abound. The rule of Sallio, for example, is principally peopled by them; and their presence is marked, both there and elsewhere, by a more than common display of the traces of industry around them. It is said, too, that they are in general more moral than their Roman Catholic neighbours, and it is true that they are better educated; indeed, education among the Catholic portion of the Hungarian peasantry is entirely neglected. But I am bound to add, that from the Catholics, though the dominant party in the state, the Protestants receive no annoyance. The most perfect harmony, on the contrary, prevails; for no person considers it necessary to fall out with his neighbour because of differences in their creed; and the very clergy of the civil churches exercise all the rites of hospitality one towards another. As I shall have occasion to revert to this subject by and by, when it will fall in more naturally with the order of my journal, I must for the present content myself with remarking, that the spirit of tolerance is more conspicuous among the Romanists than among their rivals. I never heard a Catholic speak with a sneer at the faith of the Protestants; I never heard a Protestant speak otherwise than contemptuously of the intolerance and superstition of his Catholic neighbour.—Gleig's Hungary, &c.

FEMALE EDUCATION IN EGYPT.—G. R. C., a correspondent of the N. Y. Observer, under date of Alexandria, Long Egypt, April 2, 1858, says:—

A movement has been made by the Pasha recently at Cairo, in the cause of female education, which is most extraordinary, and may prove important results. He has proposed to Minister, an English lady employed as a missionary teacher in Cairo, to take under her charge a female school of one hundred pupils; and the scholars with whom he begins the experiment, are set the example to his people, he has desired to have them instructed, are his own daughters. The Princess of Egypt is the patroness of the new institution, and Mrs. Halliday has been prevailed on to visit Egypt, with the view of superintending the Pasha's in Cairo as her interpreter, under the most auspicious circumstances, with the most pleasing reception. The charge of Mrs. Halliday in the proposed school commences the very day on which I am writing; but whether with the whole of the proposed hundred pupils immediately, or whether her teachings will be comparatively private till assistant teachers, who have been sent for, shall be received from the West, is not yet determined. That to-day she begins her course of instruction in the harem of the Pasha, in the continued four hours each day, except Friday, the Mahommedan Sabbath, and our own Lord's-day. A movement of this kind in Egypt is astonishing to a degree that makes it almost incredible; nor can any thing more evidently prove the largeness of the Pasha's mind, and his superiority to the prejudices of this absolutely ignorant and superstitious people. That in the midst of this degraded country, where the women are comparatively more degraded than in any other, where the Koran itself declares that they have no souls, and where they have been regarded as mere instruments of pleasure, appendages of gratification among the furniture of an Egyptian household, the perfect slaves of the men, with scarce thought, mind, or action of their own—that here a movement should be made for the education of females, and that it should commence in the very heart of the harem of the sovereign, so as to defy and set at naught the prejudices of all who might otherwise have opposed it—is indeed a wonderful event. The Supreme Disposer of all events only knows to what results this new movement may lead, or to what extent and with what success it shall be carried on; but if it should proceed thoroughly and extensively for but one generation, it is certain that the Pasha has laid the foundation for an entire revolution in the habits of the country, a foundation, indeed, for the renovation of Egypt, and a preparation for the way of the Lord, an highway for the spread of the gospel, such as no other means could have effected.—Christ. Watchman.

SINGULAR RETRIBUTION.—Our readers will recollect the afflicting murder of the missionaries, Lyman and Munson, among the Batta, a year or two since. By an extract from the Annual Report of the American Board, read at their late meeting in Portland, we learnt the following fact. A Missionary of the Board recently made a tour in that country, and ascertained that those devoted men would not have been killed had their objects been known. The tribe that destroyed them was at war with another tribe, and being out upon a warlike expedition, they discovered these two strangers. In the excitement of their feelings, they immediately killed them. When the news of this affair reached the neighbouring villages and tribes, and they ascertained from various sources that the Missionaries were good men, and came to do them good, they were filled with indignation. Assembling their forces, they marched against the village, burned the houses, destroyed the gardens, killed some of the inhabitants, and dispersed the rest. The place was called Sacoa, and is now no more inhabited. A jungle is growing thickly over its ruins. How soon did their wicked deed result, in destruction!

upon their own heads! It is indeed, a singular circumstance, that heathen tribes should destroy one of their own villages, in revenge for the murder of Christian Missionaries. A mission will, probably, be established among them.—Zion's Advocate.

EDUCATION.

Mr. Cowie, of St. John's College, Cambridge, is declared senior wrangler; the three gentlemen who rank next after him are all of that college, a circumstance without parallel in its annals. This is the third year, in succession, in which St. John's College has carried off the first prize.—Christ. Advs.

MERCHANT-SEAMEN.

AVERAGE AGES OF SEAMEN.—The career of seamen in their vocations," say the Committee of the Dreadnought hospital in their Report, "is shorter, in the average, than that of any other description of labourer." The following results in furnished by the registry of merchant-seamen at the London Custom House:

AVERAGE AGES OF FIVE THOUSAND MERCHANT-SEAMEN.
Under 15 years of age..... 59 | 40 and under 50..... 672
" 15 and under 20..... 474 | 50 and under 60..... 234
" 20 and under 30..... 2,370 | 60 and under 70..... 49
" 30 and under 40..... 1,161 | 70 and upwards..... 9
In this table, the strongest possible argument is afforded in favour of those valuable institutions for the benefit of sailors in sickness or in declining life—or for the relief of their widows and orphans—which have been established, or are in progress in the thorough of Tyne-mouth and elsewhere. The striking circumstance, that out of 5,000 seafaring labourers, only 40 appear to have had employment at the age of sixty, ought not to be disregarded by the sailors' friends.—Manchester Courier.

NORTH BRITAIN, OR NEWCASTLE AND LONDON RAILWAY.—The project of establishing a railway between Newcastle and Edinburgh on the east coast, by way of Berwick, is now seriously entertained. A prospectus of the undertaking has just been issued. From it we collect that the railway, is to be called "The Great North British Railway." The capital is to be £2,000,000, in 40,000 shares of £50 each, deposit £5 per share. The provisional committee for Edinburgh and Newcastle are highly respectable and influential. Mr. Geo. Stephenson, the celebrated engineer, in his report on this undertaking says:—"I may say that in the whole course of my experience I never examined a country for a line of railway, of the length this will be, where the works to be executed were of an easier description, or the levels and inclinations of a more favourable character." The committee themselves, who have spared no pains to ascertain the best line, say—"The result of this investigation, made by the promoters, has been the adoption of the line now proposed; and after mature consideration the committee are satisfied that this is the only one which can be made between England and Scotland with a due regard to the interests of the great mass of the community, and to that of the proprietors." They add:—"The free revenue has been estimated, after deducting, 40 per cent for an annual charge, at upwards of £215,000 this affording a return of nearly eleven per cent. on the capital."—Carlisle Journal.

The Rev. Michael Crotty, an ordained Roman Catholic priest, has given legal notice to the astor Board of Guardians of his intention to enter into the holy state of matrimony.—Birmingham Advertiser.

PRETTY LAMBERT LYNCH.—On Monday week some fellow stole fourteen geese from Mr. Thomas Smith, of great Birmingham, Heris, and left a bag containing fourteen farthings, and the following distich tied round the neck of the gander:—
Mr. Smith, you lives here, and I live yonder;
I've bought fourteen geese
At a farthing a piece on the capital."—Carlisle Journal.

MEDICAL COUNSEL.—Sir Henry Hallford prescribed ice-cream to some old Dwyer, who complained of her stomach. "Oh! Sir Henry," she said, "it is too cold—my stomach can't bear it." "Then, my lady," answered the obliging physician, "you may have your ice warmed."—Gentleman's Magazine.

RAILWAY CAPITAL AND TURNPIKE ROADS.—The capital, authorized to be raised for making railways, under a act passed in the four sessions of 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, was £9,000,000; and the estimate of those for which bills were passed in 1837 was $1,000,000. The debts due upon turnpike-roads in England and Wales amount to upwards of eight millions and a half; for a great portion of which a very fragile security will remain when railways (if ever) come into full operation.—Cheshire Advocate.

COPENHAGEN, JAN. 12.—The total number of ships that passed the Sound last year was 19,900. This is the greatest number that has yet passed the Sound. The year 1829 was hitherto that in which the navigation was the most active, the number of ships being 19,486. It is worthy of remark, that in the first half-year of 1838 the number of ships was less by 664 than in the same period of 1837, so that the navigation must have been more brisk in the second half of 1838 than might have been inferred from the total amounts.—Newcastle Courant.

LONGEVITY OF THE AMERICAN FATHERS.—No less than thirteen of the fifty-six signers of American Independence reached the age of eighty years and upwards, viz:—

Charles Carroll, of Maryland,	85
William Ellery, of Rhode Island,	90
John Adams of Massachusetts,	91
Samuel Adams, do,	81
Robert Treat Paine, do,	93
Benjamin Franklin, do,	84
William Williams, of Connecticut,	91
William Floyd, of Long Island,	87
Thomas McKean, of Pennsylvania,	88
Thomas Jefferson, Virginia,	83
George Wythe, do,	89
Matthew Thornton, of Ireland,	89
Francis Lewis, of South Wales,	89

Being an average of eighty-six years and two months each, and the aggregate excess of the 'time honoured thirties' equal four score' is just eighty years. No deliberate assembly of equal magnitude was ever more remarkable, for the virtue, temperance, and longevity of its members, than the one which declared the American colonies free and Independent.—Pontoon.

THE GREAT WESTERN.—The great Western returned 6,750 letters. The estimated amount of her receipts for her last voyage from Bristol, and for 140 passengers is dollars 24,000, for 150 tons freight at $1. dollars 1,120. Letters, 1,000.—Total, dollars 27,840.—Christian Workman.

MILK.—A card is published in the New-York papers signed by fifty-two physicians, expressing an opinion that the milk of cows fed chiefly on distillery slops, is extremely detrimental to health, especially of young children, as it not only contains too little nutriment for the purposes of food, but appears to possess unhealthily properties, owing in part, probably, to the confinement of the cows, and the bad air which they consequently have to breathe, as well as the so natural and pernicious nature of the slops on which they are fed.—Ibid.

PRAYER CONVENTION.—This Convention met at the Marlboro' Chapel in this City on Tuesday, the 18th, at 10 o'clock, A. M. As our paper goes to press in the midst of its proceedings, we must defer a fuller account to our next, and can only say, at present, that matters took such a course, and the Convention itself was constituted in such a manner, women being admitted to deliberate, and vote, and get on committees, that several gentlemen who had enrolled their names as members, withdrew, and among them four clergymen who had been put on the Business Committee.—Ibid.

DEATH OF GOVERNOR CLARK.—The St. Louis papers of the 3d inst., bring information of the death of Gov. William Clark, whose name is imperishably associated with that of the late Merriweather Lewis, in the history of the expedition to the Pacific Ocean, across the Rocky Mountains. He died at the residence of his son, in St. Louis, on the 1st inst., aged 68 years.—Ibid.

THE BRIDGE OF CULZAC.—A remarkable bridge is now considerably advanced in France, which will be one of the most remarkable structures of the kind in the world. It is a suspension bridge, of five arches or spans, each of which is 300 feet in width. The floor will be 70 feet above the surface of the water. The suspension chains will be supported by columns of cast iron 90 feet in height, resting on pedestals of masonry.—Ibid.

THE LONDON MAY MEETINGS.—By the last Mail we have received our files to the 15th May; and the first use we make of them, is to lay before our readers, a brief account of the Annual Meetings in the Metropolis. We have selected them nearly as they caught our attention; for our papers reached us piece-meal, the last date coming first. There is still a considerable reserve for next week; besides a quantity of miscellaneous information of no trifling interest. We shall not at present indulge in general observations on the character of the meetings. In one of the London papers, the speeches are said to have been generally flat. There were exceptions, however, some for the better and some for the worse. At a few of the meetings, strong and bigoted political feeling was exhibited, but at others a solemn and earnest spirit prevailed. On the whole it is grievous to see the pervasiveness of (much laughter) so frequently interlarding the speeches. Laughing is not the appropriate enjoyment of religious assemblies. A few of the speakers at the meeting of the London Missionary Society seemed desirous of getting up something after the fashion of the Methodist Centenary collections. The more is the pity—but even such men as Byles and James were foremost in this attempt. Happily it may be said to have failed. Only £1,600 were raised by its attempt. But we shall not longer detain our readers.

The Annual Meeting of the Baptist Home Missionary Society was held on Monday evening, the 29th April, at Fishery Square, with T. Chasles, Esq. in the chair. The Rev. Mr. Roe, the Secretary, read the report; the details of which are said to have been exceedingly interesting. In conclusion it stated, that more money had been collected than in any former year, and none of it had been under the hand of legacies. Two new Associations, in Warwickshire and Norfolk, had been formed, with committees zealously resolved to take up this work as their own. Many of the large towns had established town Missions, which were in active operation; and some of the counties had Home Missions independent of the Society, which were vigorously prosecuting the good work. Yet was there a fearful mass of evil and wretched depravity in the country. The speakers were the chairman, the Rev. Dr. Cox, Rev. J. Davis, Thomas Thomson, Esq., Rev. C. Stovell, Rev. Mr. Tremarck, Rev. J. Edwards, and Rev. S. Green. Allusion was made by Mr. Stovell to a mode of reviving the churches which has lately been introduced, by the visitation of ministers from other quarters. "The Society had agents travelling from church to church, from county to county; but they had all, until recently, been employed in collecting funds, or raising the means to supply the necessity and replenish the treasury of the Society. That was good, so far as it went; it was a necessary duty, but he thought, and his brethren thought, that it was needful for this country that men should pass through the different districts, and visit the different churches, not to get, but to give—not to seek theirs but to bestow theirs, not to collect money, but to gather the outcasts of humanity, and to press upon them, with augmented zeal, the duty of yielding their hearts to God."

The 25th Anniversary of the Baptist Irish Society was held on Tuesday evening, the 30th April, J. J. Briscoe, Esq. M. P. in the chair. The Secretary read a few extracts from the Report. The Schools had continued with but little alteration. Many of the School-house had served as preaching places to the Missionaries, when visiting the towns and villages in which they were situated. By far the larger number of children were those of Roman Catholic parents, and, but for the means provided by this Society, they would, in all probability, grow up in ignorance. The Rev. C. Anderson, of Edinburgh, moved the adoption of the Report. "The desire of the Irish," said he, "for education was most intense. Perhaps some present might have heard of a school where there were no books, and yet they were taught to read; no slates, and yet they were taught arithmetic; no paper, pens, or ink, and yet they were taught writing. This might perhaps be styled a real Irish School! The School, however, alas! was a Church Yard: the epitaphs on the stones served for books, and the long flat stones and little bits of chalk did all the rest. Such was the intense desire of the Irish people—there was nothing like it on this side the Channel." Mr. Anderson urged on the Society especially a rigid attention to the Irish language, and the placing of preaching before the maintenance of schools. The other speakers were the Chairman, the Rev. O. Winslow, of New York, Rev. Dr. Cox, Rev. W. Brook, Rev. J. Bates, Mr. J. Burge, the Treasurer, Rev. J. Statham, Rev. W. Groser, Rev. J. Girwood, and Rev. J. Roe.

The 27th Anniversary of the Baptist Union was held on the 2d May, at which the Rev. T. Swan, of Birmingham, presided. After a long and energetic address from the Chairman, the Secretary, the Rev. J. Belcher, read the Report, from which the following items of the statistics of the Baptist Denomination are gathered. It appears that there are somewhat more than 1,500 Baptist Churches in Great Britain, of which 635 are united in 57 local associations; that in the twelve months preceding the date of the last returns, there were baptized in 804 of those churches 5,400 persons. The clear increase of members in 786 Churches during the past year, was 8,306; and the number of members in 681 of the associated Churches is 68,864. A division occurred in the meeting, on the point, whether, in opposing Church-rates, it was right rather to go to prison than pay them in any manner, even by allowing goods to be seized, or whether conscience might be satisfied by protesting against the exaction and permitting a seizure to be made. As we understand it, the latter view of the case was supported by a majority of 4 votes.

The 47th Anniversary of the Baptist Missionary Society was held in Fishery Chapel, on the 2d May, W. B. Gurney, Esq., in the chair; and the attendance is reported to have been larger than was ever before witnessed. Two Chairmen congratulated the meeting on the position of the Society, especially in respect of its funds; for not only had the extraordinary application for sending ten additional Missionaries into the field been more than met, but the general funds had increased at the same time by £4000. The report was read by the Rev. J. Dyer. It stated that the dispensations of Divine Providence had continued to retard that increase of agency at Calcutta, which the varied and extending operations in progress in and around that city so much required. But the translation of the Scriptures into the various languages was steadily advancing; and the labours of the Missionaries in other parts of the East Indies had been greatly blessed. The usual annual returns from the respective churches in the West Indies, showed that, amidst all the scenes of secular excitement, which had recently occurred, the work of God continued to advance in a very encouraging degree. A clear increase of 2,617 had taken place in the number of members, which was now 21,387. The inquirers were scarcely less numerous, amounting to 20,910. A large increase was also reported in the number of pupils receiving instruction in the schools of the mission: the day-schools contained 3,318, the evening schools 577, and the Sunday-schools 10,137—making in all 16,117, or 5,214 more than before reported. The Missionaries had solemnized 1,948 marriages during the past year. Since the last annual meeting, four Missionaries had embarked for the East. To the West Indies some had been sent; but it was hoped that reinforcements would be speedily furnished to Jamaica, New Providence, and Honduras. The annual receipts for the general purposes of the mission had been £16,228-10-11. And, including contributions for translations, schools, the ten new Missionaries, and other minor objects, the entire income had been £22,411-4-6. The Society had commenced the year burdened with a debt of £4000; but special donations for its liquidation had been received to the extent of £2,078. The acceptance of the Report was moved and seconded by the Rev. C. Anderson, of Edinburgh, and the Rev. T. Roberts, of Bristol, the devoted and confidential friends of Serampore; whose appearance in so prominent a place we take to be the best guarantee that could be given, of the honesty with which on both sides, the late union of the Indian Missions of the Society and Serampore has been carried into effect. It will be particularly gratifying to our brethren, who formerly composed the strength of the Serampore Mission, to know that their best and truest friends at home have still the opportunity of watching over their interests, in their new connection. We have not space for any report of the speeches made at the meeting. The other speakers were Rev. W. Brook, Rev. J. Middle-ditch, Rev. T. Swan, (who particularly referred to the death of Mr. Peuney, and read a letter from Mr. Yates to Mr. Pearce on the subject,) Rev. S. Nicholson, Rev. Dr. Cox, and Rev. Dr. H. Stephen.

The 35th Anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held in Exeter Hall, on the 1st of May, Lord Buxley in the Chair. The Rev. A. Brindham read the Report. The Scriptures had been cheerfully and gratefully received to almost all parts of the world, though opposition to their circulation was still continued in some countries. The receipts of the Society during the past year were £103,925-5-11, being an increase of £3,018-1. The payments were £106,309-0-4, being an increase of £13,929-11-5. Of the receipts, £13,789-8—occurred under the head of Legacies. At the head of the list stood the name of George Hammond, Esq., who bequeathed to the Society a legacy of £10,000, duty free: in addition to which, he had also left a fourth part of the residue of his property, which would, it was believed, amount to something very considerable. He was understood also to have given one, if not two, anonymous donations of £1000 in his lifetime. The issue of Bibles and Testaments had been 658,068, being an increase of 69,670. The Report concluded by advertising to the statements put forth by the Trinitarian Bible Society, as to the inaccuracy of some of the versions issued by this institution. It acknowledged that in many cases those versions were susceptible of improvement, but the committee had come to the conclusion that it was not their duty to undertake the work. It was, however, an important fact, that those errors were not found in any points essential to salvation. The acceptance of the Report was moved by the Bishop of Winchester, who defended the extensive circulation of the Scriptures, even though inaccurate versions could not be obtained. The Rev. E. T. M. Phillips seconded the motion. Then followed the Bishop of Vermont, Lord Glenelg, and the Rev. Dr. Fatten, of New York, who rejoiced that there was no longer any fear of the two countries being embroiled in war. He believed that that was principally attributable to the benevolent societies which adorned each country. Next followed the Chevalier Beedon, the late Prussian Ambassador at Rome, who observed that no fewer than 100,000 copies of the sacred volume had been distributed in the Prussian army within eight years. He had been engaged officially at the centre of that power, which kept the Word of God from the subjects under its sway, and had there seen the reverse of all he witnessed that day. He had met, however, even there, with instances of Christian hearts animated by faith and hope; but the more he saw of that, the greater had been his abhorrence of that system which sunk one part of the population in superstition, and made the other run into infidelity. He had reason for concluding that the difficulty attendant upon the circulation of the scriptures would become greater than the Society at present imagined, but he trusted they would persevere. The Chevalier was succeeded by the Rev. T. Jackson, President of the Methodist Conference, and the Rev. M. Martio, Protestant Minister from Bourdeaux. This gentleman said that the total number of Bibles circulated in France during the past year by means of this Society and similar institutions, was 821,950. Through the blessing of God, that vast circulation of the Gospel had produced an immense amount of good in France, not only among Protestant Christians, but also amongst the Roman Catholic population. Many Roman Catholics in France were strongly inclined to become Protestants. Ducesson's translation was now allowed to be read in the schools, and many Roman Catholic priests were favourable to its circulation. One of the Colporteurs waited on the Roman Catholic Bishop of Bourdeaux with it. The Bishop expressed his approbation of it, remarking that as it was merely a translation of the Latin Vulgate, he might distribute it throughout his diocese. The rest of the speakers were Rev. J. Ely, of Leeds, Rev. T. S. Grimshaw, Rev. S. Nicholson, Rev. G. Brown, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, Lord Mountsundford, and the President. The meeting appears to have been eminently good.

The 36th Annual Meeting of the Church Missionary Society was held in Exeter Hall, on the 30th April, the Earl of Cathcart in the Chair. In opening the business of the day, and lamenting the deficiency in the Society's funds, his Lordship observed, "I have lately heard much of discussions upon the constitution of our Missionary Societies: many faults have, I heard, been found with this and with that; but few have seemed prepared to mend what they find amiss, or vigorously to help what they cannot mend. I for one am always ready to admit that it is most desirable from time to time to revise and improve our different institutions, and even to fashion them according to modern use, when that taste is, as I believe it to be at present, in favour of a stricter adherence to Church discipline and Church order." We have here high authority, for such we have lately said on the subject of Societies; and it will be seen we are by no means singular in our opinions. The Rev. Mr. Jowett, the Secretary, read the Report, which stated that the expenditure of the past year had very far exceeded its income, the income being £71,906-10-6, and the expenditure £91,453-9-1; therefore the excess of expenditure was no less a sum than £20,546-9-5. The income of the preceding year had been £62,701-11-8. The actual expenditure of the missions had exceeded the estimated sum by £9,485-10.—A very serious amount of expenditure in the West Indies had been occasioned by the solicitude of the Committee to render the agency of the society as effective as possible in the great crisis of the transition from a state of slavery to a state of freedom. In pursuance of this design, no fewer than forty individuals, including females, went out from the Society to the West Indies within the last five years. The cost, too, of building, as well the school-houses, aided by Parliamentary grants, as those for other purposes, had exceeded the estimated amount. The deficiency arose from incidental circumstances. Several large remittances, and others of a smaller amount, which in regular course belonged to the year 1858-9, did not reach the Committee until after the 31st March, when the year's accounts were closed. These, in fact, amounted to more than the sum deficient. The Bishop of Winchester moved the adoption of the Report, and notwithstanding the pecuniary difficulties of the Society, energetically and eloquently urged that there should be no contraction of its efforts. The speakers who followed were the Rev. Messrs. F. Close, H. Raikes, R. Burgess and E. Bickersteth, Lords Teignmouth and Mountsundford, and J. P. Plumptre, Esq. M. P. The prevailing topic was the alarming spread of popery. Horror on this point seemed to create a sort of revulsion in favour of Dissenters. At least Mr. Raikes was so charitable as to say, "he would give the right hand of friendship to a Protestant Dissenter whenever he met him in a foreign land; (what not still he had got him out of English soil!) and the more so because he knew that the doctrine of the gospel which the Protestant Dissenter preached, would ever be exposed to the same virulent opposition as that in which he himself believed—and also because he felt he could neither have our exercise any undue advantage over himself in the contest against superstition and infidelity. But it was not the same thing with regard to Popery." "To hold no peace with Rome," was the watchword given to the meeting.

A supplementary meeting of the Society was held to the same place in the evening, the Marquis of Cholmondeley in the chair, with particular reference to the state of the funds; but with what result we have not seen.

The Annual Meeting of the Weekday Missionary Society was held in Exeter Hall, on the 29th April, J. P. Plumptre, Rev. M. P., in the chair. After an address from the Chairman, the Report was read by the Rev. John Beecham. The following is a general summary of the Society's operations. The principal central stations occupied by the Society, in various parts of the world, are about two hundred and fifteen. The Missionaries are 841, besides Catechists, Local Preachers, Assistants, Superintendents of Schools, Schoolmasters and Mistresses, and Artisans, of whom about 800 are employed at a moderate salary, and 336 afford their services gratuitously. The total number of communicants on the Mission Stations, according to the last return, is 66,808, being an increase of 807 on the return of the previous year. This total does not include the number under the care of the Missionaries in Ireland. The number of scholars in the Mission Schools is upwards of 80,000. Forty-three persons, including the wives of Missionaries, have been sent out since the last Anniversary, and twelve have returned. The income of the year is £24,218 and the expenditure £10,077. The Missions of the Society are situated in Sweden, Germany, France, Spain and Malta; in Ceylon and Continental India; the South Seas, New Zealand, and Australia; Southern and Western Africa; and in the West Indies, and North America. The first motion was moved and seconded by two M. P.'s, W. Evans, Esq. and Colonel Conolly. Dr. Bunting then introduced Rev. Dr. Patten and Rev. Dr. Bennett, representatives to the Missionary Society from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The latter gentleman created a great excitement by saying, "I am from the haunted land of freedom, where they talk a great deal about liberty, and yet hold slaves. But, although I come from a land where we hold slaves, I am still the friend of universal emancipation; and I congratulate our Wesleyan brethren, that they have had no small share in conferring emancipation upon the slaves in the West Indies. I am no prophet, but I am impelled by strong feeling to declare—in a country where I may speak my sentiments without fear—for I have not always been permitted to do so in my native land—that I believe the time is not far distant when a brighter sun passing over the country of my nativity, you may send Wesleyan Missionaries, and Missionaries may be sent by other denominations, to preach to emancipated slaves in the United States of America." The meeting speakers were K. Lytton, Esq. M. P., Rev. S. Shipley, Vicar of Ashton, Mr. Sergeant Jackson, Rev. Thos. Jackson, President of the Conference, Rev. P. Latrobe, Rev. T. Lessey, H. Pownell, Esq. and Dr. Duff, who had travelled 150 miles that morning to be present. Of our excellent friend's speech no abstract is given in the Patrician, because no justice could be done to it in an abstract; but the Watchman's report of it is said to close thus: "The Reverend gentleman sat down amidst great applause, he in a state of extreme exhaustion, from the ardent exertions he used in the delivery of his speech, of which but an imperfect notion is conveyed by this report; nor can the fervour and eloquence with which it was delivered, or the applause which it elicited, be described verbally." We are tempted to ask, why Dr. Duff is allowed to kill himself by exertions of this nature. The meeting was next addressed by Rev. J. Dixon, Rev. R. Newton and a few others.

The 14th Annual Meeting of the Christian Instruction Society, was held on Tuesday evening, the 30th April, C. Hindley, Esq. M.P., in the Chair. The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, observed that the importance of the Society could not be better illustrated than by the fact, stated in the Report of the previous year, that no fewer than 50,000 families, nearly one-eighth of the whole number in the metropolis, were visited by its agents; and this had been accomplished by a union of voluntary and paid agency, for the paltry sum of £2000 or £700. The Rev. J. Blackburn read the Report of the past year, from which it appeared, that the Society comprises 97 associations, with 3028 visitors, and 146 prayer-stations, and 48,870 families had been visited in the course of the year. In connection with the associations, there are also 13 Missions established. The Committee had suggested in the formation or progress of 15 provincial associations in towns and villages in different parts of the country. J. Pimm, Esq. read the treasurer's account, from which it appeared that the expenditure of the year had been £1,444-0-8, and the receipts, £1,536-10-10.

The speakers were Sir C. E. Smith, Rev. Dr. Patten, Rev. Robert Ainslie, Rev. A. White, Rev. R. M. Overbury, Rev. J. Edwards, T. Chellis, Esq., and Rev. J. Blackburn.

The Anniversary of the London Missionary Society was held in Exeter Hall, on the 9th of May, Sir C. E. Smith in the Chair. In consequence of the indisposition of the Secretaries, the Report was read by the Rev. J. J. Freeman. The following is the number of Missionary Stations and Out-stations connected with the Society, with the Missionaries and Assistants employed at them:

	Stations, and out-stations.	Missionaries.	Assistants, Native, &c.
South Seas, ...	188	80	180
Ultra Ganges, ...	5	8	4
East Indies, ...	316	68	310
Russia, ...	8	2	2
Mediterranean, ...	1	1	—
South Africa and African Islands, ...	50	31	38
West Indies, ...	41	16	20

Thirty individuals, besides their children, had been sent out during the past year. The number of churches was 101, communicants 8,287, and scholars 41,792, being an increase in the year of 8 churches, 940 communicants, and 4,818 scholars. The income of the Society was £25,490-10-5; of which £1,453-3 had been received by legacies. The expenditure was £10,077-17-11, being an excess beyond the income of £15,412-13-4. The chairman then addressed the assembly with much feeling. One of his expressions we do not understand. "We are labouring in the same cause with Swartz, with Rhenius your own Missionary, the last of those who have left their labours in the world to join those above who have been labouring in the same cause." Now we have understood, by late publications from both sides of the Atlantic, that the London Missionary Society had refused to receive the apostolic Rhenius, unless he would abandon his people, and withdraw to another field, where no interference would occur with the territorial rights of the Church Missionary Society. We suppose it was a mistake of Sir C. E. Smith, arising from his imperfect acquaintance with the affairs of the London Missionary Society. The meeting was one of the most intense interest. We can merely enumerate the speakers: and their names will be enough to justify the statement. They were the Rev. Dr. Wardlaw, Rev. Dr. Fletcher, Rev. Dr. Patten, Rev. Dr. King, Rev. Dr. Leifchild, Edward Baines, Esq. M. P., the Rev. Dr. Beman, Rev. Dr. Raffles, W. A. Hankey, Esq., the Rev. J. A. James, A. White, Esq. M. P., the Rev. Mr. Knill, and Thomas Wilson, Esq.

The 3d Annual Meeting of the Colonial Missionary Society was held on the 10th May, in Finsbury Chapel, J. R. Mills, Esq., in the Chair. The Report was read by the Rev. A. Wallis, the Secretary. Five brethren, it appeared, had been sent out during the past year to labour in Canada and South Australia. The total number of Missionaries is 16 in Canada, and 8 in Australia. The demands for additional Missionaries are exceedingly urgent, and many were ready to devote themselves to the work; but such was the state of the funds that during the ensuing summer it was not anticipated that a single Missionary could be sent to Canada. The rebellion in that country had greatly retarded the labours of the Missionaries, yet upon the whole their efforts had been crowned with great success. More than 3000 hearers attended their ministry, of whom 420 were communicants, in Upper Canada. But for the war, several of the Missionaries would by this time have been supported by their own people. The Chairman presented the statement of accounts as treasurer, from which it appeared that the receipts had been £2,336-6-8, and the expenditure £3,170-11-0; there is a balance against the Society of £760-17. To meet its present engagements an income between £2500 and £3000 is required.

The 27th Annual Meeting of the Protestant Society for the Protection of Civil and Religious Liberty, was held at the London Tavern, on Saturday, the 11th May; and the chair being occupied by His Royal Highness the Duke of Somerset, a very crowded

ed and highly respectable and hence was gathered together. The statement of the Secretary, Mr. Wilks, was very brief; and the attention of the meeting was almost wholly occupied by speeches which acquired extraordinary power from the political movements which were in progress at the time, as well as the known ability of the speakers. These were the Rev. J. Burnett, W. Tooke, Esq., Dr. Brown, Sir C. E. Smith, the Rev. J. H. Hinton, Edward Baines, Esq. M. P., G. Haithcote, Esq., Rev. J. Gawthorn, Rev. Dr. Patten, Mr. Alexander, a Quaker, John Wilks, Esq., Rev. Dr. Wardlaw, Rev. T. Russell, and Henry Waymouth, Esq. The business of the day was appropriately closed by His Royal Highness himself; and as present circumstances give peculiar interest to his sentiments, we shall give his exposition of them entire. He spoke to the following effect, in acknowledgement of the customary vote of thanks: "Let me in the first place return you my best thanks for the vote just passed, and though you have had a long session—(A laugh)—I am sure no one will depart without being highly gratified at hearing the different opinions and sentiments which have been expressed. I feel called upon, before I retire, to make a few observations on what has been said by the several speakers, to whom I have listened with the utmost eagerness and attention. I will begin by referring to the manner in which the name of our most gracious Sovereign was received (loud and long continued cheers.) No one can feel a deeper interest either in her happiness, her welfare, her glory, or her honour, than I do. (Renewed cheering.) I was present at her birth, and from that hour I have cherished towards her as much affection, and looked up to her with as much interest as if she had been a child of my own. It was therefore highly gratifying to me to observe, that when that Royal name was pronounced, it produced that feeling of manly which Royalty should always command, when it condenses itself in a way to deserve the affection of the people. (Loud cheers.) I was equally gratified in hearing the expressions which were made use of, and the opinions delivered, respecting the transactions of the last four or five days. Situated as I am, the company will feel that it is a difficult task for me to say anything on the subject—but thus much will I say, that down to yesterday, although fully determined to attend this meeting, my mind was deeply oppressed, and I came here very much in the spirit of the first resolution, thinking that it might be important to have some individual of weight expressing any to the public those opinions upon which we are determined to stand. (Deafening applause.) The features of the scene are altered. (Hear, hear, hear.) But as in all tales there is a moral, what we might have been called upon to have expressed more strongly, we may be now enabled to convey in giving the hand of good fellowship and congratulating those who are restored to the seat from which we feared they had gone. (Loud cheers.) Many of those distinguished individuals who filled places of great responsibility, are men whom I love, many of them I esteem; but at the same time, I cannot conceal that there was a want of expression upon certain points—(Hear)—which created in me a very uneasy feeling. (Hear.) Now, I am perfectly satisfied that if the government will act fairly towards the public—if they will go on—I do not wish them to go on at full gallop—(Laughter)—and I will presently tell you why—if they will go on slowly, and show that they are moving, and determined to go on—the public—the honest, the quiet, the good men, will support them, and carry them through. (Cheers.) But there must be no shuffling. (Immense cheers.) Before I proceed farther, I come back to my point, for I said we must not go on at full gallop. I am about to make a remark, in which a great many gentlemen may differ from me—but I cannot help it. In that immense hurry in which we were to carry the Slavery question, we were brought into great difficulties; and indeed they have occasioned the very position in which the Ministry are now placed; because, if we had waited a little time—I do not mean to say that we should have remained stationary—but if we had looked at the Apprenticeship Act—if we had duly weighed how those people were to be provided for when emancipated—that the proprietors had no right to be called on to house them, feed them, and provide for them;—and, on the other hand, if we had taken into consideration that these proprietors ought to have been secured from that impetus, which a want of this provision might have made might occur—

—we should have passed preliminary and cautious laws to meet the emergency, and things would then have moved on well. However, that was not the case. But we have carried the cause, and I am happy that we have gained it. But I am convinced that, unless the measure now in progress be carried, all we have done will go back again. (Cheers.) In Ireland, and elsewhere, I was always opposed to Coercion Bills, and so I am upon this question; but when you come to look at the minor evil, and perceive that it is to avoid a greater evil, I think you are called on to pass that law. It is for the security of the negroes, and it is also for the security of the proprietors, that they should be called to their senses, and taught what to do; and if they will not, then the legislature must enforce it. I said, we should consider our opinion, so far as to state them. In the great majority of topics which have been represented to you to-day I fully concur, but with respect to one or two, for the sake of argument, I might draw distinctions; as to principle, however, I admit the whole. In the one relative to church-building, I rather differ from you; but I will explain. I should object to the forcing or compelling the erection of churches at the public expense; but I cannot see why, if you have churches, I will suppose in the City of London, and finding that the people who formerly attended them have gone to other parts of the town, you should not have the churches taken and placed there, and the revenues employed for their benefit; that is one thing, but to come and make a demand on the public, unless absolutely necessary, I call that an imposition. (Cheers.) It is not merely injustice, but imposition. On that point I perfectly agree with you. Then comes the most material question of the whole, which is the education system. On that I can have but one opinion, that to make religion a stumbling-block to education is a thing which, as a conscientious and honest man, I cannot do. Nay more, without going into the classification of sects, but looking upon Christianity as a Catholic religion, the only light in which it should be regarded, for we are all communities, and it is the union of these communities that forms the Christian church, I understand it in no other way. But if laymen are not to be allowed to teach those various religions which are not connected with religion, and we are to be taught only by those who are to teach us religion, I say that education will fall, and I will tell you why. I have no objection, on the contrary, I would attach great blame to any head of a family who does not take care that his child is brought up in that religion which he thinks the purest. That is his duty. But after having said so, that they should have his mind crippled by particular bias, and not be allowed to exercise that, I have a decided objection. I state this sentiment very boldly—I mean it very honestly. (Cheers.) I consider that civil government—in that phraseology—is a government. The sword, by which I mean the sword of justice, or power, is to be employed in the regulation of the affairs of this world; and so far the protection of the government may be extended to all communities, that bring the condition on which they surrender a portion of their liberty. But civil government ought never to interfere with communities, except when they break the peace, or manifest a tendency to it; then only is the government to act. That is my opinion: so far they have a right to interfere; and these communities having the security of their persons and properties must submit to those laws which have respect to the regulation of society. There is another objection I feel, which is the attempt, in spiritual things, to give them a special pleading character; but in spiritual things there must be a clear, definite system—it is your communication with your Maker,—the more sincere it is, the nearer you come to contact with him, and the more you come in contact, the purer will be your effusion, and that effusion is inspiration. That is my impression of religion. I do not quarrel with any man on account of his religion. I have not studied any one religion, but have read them all, as a philosopher, in which I have not found some good, more or less. I am convinced that so long as a man is religiously attached to some one profession or other, a good government ought to be perfectly satisfied with it. You require a religious nation, but you do not wish a particular sect to be predominant. I give this as my opinion—the result of a great deal of reflection and conscientious inquiry. I refer to some of the speeches you have heard, particularly to that of the American gentleman, whom I am delighted to see engaged in this cause; and to that of my friend Mr. Wymouth, who was also present at the dinner given in commemoration of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. To that dinner Catholic communion is due. It was that dinner that stamped it. It was not a question whether their religion was better than yours, but they were deprived of their civil rights, and we were determined that they should be brought to the same level as the rest of the community. And why? Because Christianity, as a whole, is composed of a variety of different parties. We ought never to lose sight of that, it is an extraordinary circumstance, seldom observed on by writers on the subject. We are often referred to the regulations of the Jewish system; but that has nothing to do, in any shape whatever, with the present question. If I understand the Jewish history, there was a religion created, and upon that the nation was formed. They were divided into twelve tribes, but they were kept distinct—a separate nation in every particular; they were not allowed to marry out of their own tribe; and they became a select nation because separated from the world. Now Christianity belongs to all nations. (Hear, hear.) If you look east or west, or north or south, you find Christians every where, and, therefore, to confine the name of Christian to any one nation is improper. You have Spaniards, and Dutch, and Italian, and German, with their national prejudices, but the principles of Christianity prevail in all these nations, and it is your duty to make them feel that there is one common bond of union. I have detained you long, but I was anxious to express my opinions on this subject, because I have no doubt that these opinions will go forth to the world, and I wish it to be understood that I am not ashamed of them. (Cheers.) I stand by them; and if any divine wisdom to catechise me on the subject, I think I can give him his answer. (Laughter and cheers.) I am now growing old, being in my 67th year; and the study of these subjects is to me, on many accounts, interesting. I am satisfied that, without religion, the world cannot go on; but the principles advocated this day are also of great importance. Your claims must be put forward, and the more they are discussed the more will they be fatal to its just. But if you have not a Liberal Government you cannot carry your objects. By carrying the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts—which, it is true, was carried against the will of the Government—we forced on the measure for relieving the Catholics of their disabilities, but has the principle been carried out and acted upon? No, because, if not, the design has failed. I think that is the fair way of putting the question. I am not one of those persons who are to be put down by clamour and noise; my sentiments are the result of honest conviction; and, when I am convinced, the whole world will not turn me from my opinions. (Cheers.) I can only say that I have experienced great pleasure in meeting you this day. I trust you have participated in my delight; and the remembrance of this day will be one of the products of my recollection. (Loud and long cheers.)

REV. J. LEECHMAN.—Our friends are generally aware, that when it had been ascertained that our late Colleague would not return to India, and his father-in-law, the Rev. George Barclay, had been taken to his rest, he accepted the invitation of the Church at Irvine to undertake the pastorate amongst them. He began his arduous labours as their Pastor at the close of last autumn; and every letter we receive from him affords the gratifying information that his services are increasingly acceptable and successful. His experience in this country has led him to employ himself as a town Missionary, as well as the Pastor of the Church; and in both capacities he enjoys much of the Divine blessing. His last letter to us was dated the 6th of April; at which time fifteen persons had been added to the Church by baptism; a number more were earnestly seeking the same privilege; and the congregation had so increased that the old chapel was no longer sufficient. Ground had been selected for a new one in a far more eligible situation, the plan of it had been drawn, and the people had pledged themselves to contribute at least £300 for its erection. On receiving this intelligence, Mr. Leechman's friends at Serampore determined to send a contribution for the Chapel, as a testimony of their deep attachment to him and his people; and as there are a number of individuals in this country, who from friendship to Mr. Leechman, or acquaintance with the people at Irvine, might be desirous of expressing their regard in the same way, we take this opportunity of giving them notice, that we shall be exceedingly happy to take charge of their donations, and remit them to Irvine when we send our own.

Mrs. BARCLAY.—It will gratify a number of our readers to learn, that we have lately received a letter from our dear friend Mrs. Barclay, dated the 30th April. At that time the Exmouth had just passed the Cape, by a couple of degrees. As was to be expected, under the kind and considerate care of Captain Warren, she had received every attention that could contribute to her comfort. In the hot latitudes she had suffered severely; but for some time before she wrote, her health had been greatly improved. Before this time, we have no doubt, she has reached her native home.

THE TRANSLATION AND PRINTING OF THE ACTS.—The Courier can see no reason for translating and printing the Acts of Government, in the Oorino language, in the Western Provinces, in which it is indigenous, unless, indeed, the Laws were revised there. Upon the same principle, there could be no reason for translating the Acts into the languages which prevail under the Madras and Bombay Presidencies, at those Presidencies, unless, indeed, the Laws were enacted there. As soon, therefore, as the power of legislation was taken from them, and transferred to Calcutta, the translation of the Laws should have been sent here, and the printing consigned to the Military Orphan Press. If a translation from French into English could be accomplished in London, as will be in Paris, it equal talent were employed, it stands to reason, that a translation from English into Tamil could be accomplished just as well in Calcutta as at Madras, equal talent being applied to the work. Yet it is certain, that any proposal for such transfer would be treated at the minor Presidencies with the scorn it deserves; and that the disgust already felt at the arrangements of the new Charter, by which they have been reduced to insignificance, would justly be increased. There can be no reason for translating the Regulations into Oorin in Calcutta, which would not equally apply to the languages at the other Presidencies. There is no reason for doing it now, except that the printing may go to the Bengal Military Orphan Press; which is a sorry reason, indeed, when weighed in the scales with the convenience of the community in the West.

We must beg the reader's pardon for a passing allusion to our own concerns, which the Courier forces on us by the remark.—We would ask our brother if the idea of the superiority of the North Western Provinces ever came across his mind, during the period in which he entertained the wish to have the translations printed at Serampore? We challenge the Editor of the Courier to produce the slightest proof of any such wish, either in writing or in speech. This wish has never, for a moment, been entertained. It is now eighteen months since the death of two near relatives rendered it imperative to contract the operation of the press at Serampore; and we have at length succeeded in limiting it strictly to the publication of our own journals and works; and no prospect of profit could have induced us to add extraneous works to the office. We did propose to publish a Bengalee Gazette twelve months ago; but it was with the understanding that when it had attained form and consistency, we should be at liberty to resign it. The price of the Gazette was, at the same time, fixed at so low a rate, as to be scarcely remunerative. As soon, however, as Dr. Corbyn and the Management attacked the arrangement as mercenary, and as interfering with the rights of poor orphans, the publication of the paper at Serampore became impossible. In urging so repeatedly on Government the revival of the Translatorships, and the publication of a Native Gazette, we have been charged by a certain portion of the press with mean and selfish motives. But as it is impossible that we should derive the smallest personal advantage from the accomplishment of the plans we have proposed, we shall continue to agitate the subject, till all the enactments which the Natives are bound to obey, are put before them in their own language, in the cheapest and most suitable form. We shall watch with care over the progress which Government may make, in the prosecution of this object, and shall not be scared from suggesting improvements, by any consideration of opposing interests. As soon as the Translatorship is filled up, we propose to enter upon the subject of the present mode of printing the regulations, and the price at which they now reach the Native public.

RUSSIA IN THE EAST.—The great excitement occasioned by a double change of Ministry in four days, by the insult offered to the Queen of England by Sir Robert Peel, and by the just resentment of Her Majesty, has created that bustle which is the very element of British life, and for a time has cast the affairs of the East into the shade. The vote of censure with which Lord Auckland was threatened in the House of Commons, and which might have deprived this country of His Lordship's services, has not even been mooted. All eyes have been turned upon the movements of the political chess-board, on which two games have been completed in so short a period. For a time the deep plans of Russia are forgotten, and the indignation which her double dealing could scarcely have failed to excite, has been turned upon the Tories. In consequence of these stirring events in our domestic economy, the papers have neglected to tell us whether Count Nesselrode has actually been dismissed from the high office which he has so long held, at the head of the Russian Ministry. One thing, however, is certain, that he be dismissed or not, the onward march of Russian ambition, of which Catherine drew out the programme some sixty years ago, will not be interrupted. Even the honourable reception of the Hereditary Grand Duke at the Court of St. James's, will produce no intermission of those plans for undermining the power of England, which are so steadily pursued at Petersburg. Like the Romans of old, the Russians appear to advance steadily and deliberately to the subjugation of mankind.

If any doubt had ever been entertained of the ambitious projects of Russia, in reference to the East, they must be at once dispelled by a perusal of the last Note of that Court. In it Russia assumes to have an equal interest with England in the affairs of Afghanistan; and after having herself so far interfered with this state, lying at so great a distance from her frontier, as to guarantee the transfer of Herat to the Candahar Chiefs, calls upon England to avoid all interference with it, though it lies upon our border, and its emissaries have endeavoured to spread disaffection through our empire. The Emperor is anxious, it is true, to impress Europe with the idea, that Count Simionich acted without the orders of his Court. Probably he did; but no Russian Envoy, with the fear of Siberia before him, would act contrary to the known wishes and interests of his master. There can be little doubt, that if Sir Alexander Burnes had not obtained possession of the Russian despatches, the Emperor's guarantee would not have been withheld. Our Cabinet appears, at length, to be fully awake to the machinations of this power; and to have met them in the spirit of a calm and determined resistance. Lord Palmerston's dispatch exhibits a firmness, and a consciousness of strength, which forms a noble contrast to the pusillanimity which has too often marked the measures of the Whig Cabinet; and if it be true that Russia will pause long before she rushes into a war with England, the spirit of our Government is well calculated to cool her ardour.

To whom the holdiness and originality of the idea of marching a British army beyond the Indus, and establishing a British influence in Central Asia is due, it is not easy exactly to determine. The Englishman traces the first idea to Sir John McNeill; and he is, probably, correct. But it does no little credit to Lord Auckland's soundness of judgment and decision of character, that he should at once have adopted the idea, and carried it so vigorously into execution, on his own responsibility. Were we as well acquainted with the secret springs of those actions which have immortalized our Indian statesmen, as we are with those of the present movement, we should, probably, discover, that many of those master strokes of policy by which this empire has been saved, have been owing to the suggestions of others. We might even discover that Lord Wellesley's bold policy, in reference to Hyderabad and Tippoo Sultan, arose from his conversations with Major Kirkpatrick, whom he met at the Cape. But a mind which can grasp a bold design, and bring every appliance to bear on its execution, is not the less worthy of admiration, because the original idea was due to the sagacity of others. And the occupation of Afghanistan is a measure of that bold and statesman-like character, which will live on the historian's page. The nerve which it displays, is not among the least of its recommendations, and cannot fail to strengthen the interests of this empire, in the opinion both of India and Europe. Russia can no longer interfere in the politics of Afghanistan without a breach with England; and in this case, the first encounter will, probably, be at Herat, five hundred miles from our own boundary. Whether the adoption of Shah Soojah's cause was politic or not, must be decided by the event, and we postpone making up our minds on this minor question; but the occupation of Afghanistan, and the display of British power in Western Asia, is one of those grand events which affect the destinies of man.

We have been not a little struck with admiration, at the political foresight of Sir John McNeill, as displayed in the preface to the second edition of his celebrated pamphlet, which was published some months ago. In alluding to the real of Simionich from Teheran, he distinctly states his conviction, that he will not be recalled, but ordered to remain and remodel the Persian army. The prediction has been fulfilled. He is employed, by order of the Emperor, in organizing the Persian troops, retaining his Russian rank. So much for the honesty of Russian declarations. With an equally prophetic eye does he allude to the Grand Army of the East, under Prince Paskewitch, which has been assembled, with all the pride, pomp and circumstance of war, as having an ulterior destination beyond the conquest of the Circassians. The Journals of Europe, guided by the present appearance of things, unite in echoing the same opinion.

OPIMUM.—The Madras Circular, in allusion to the large exportation of Opium from Bengal to London, very naturally enquires whether it is the intention of merchants to ship it from thence to Canton under the rose. It is probable that some such idea may have been entertained, but we fancy that the great bulk of the Opium thus shipped, is intended, unfortunately, for home consumption. The following melancholy notice, which we have extracted from one of the most recent London Journals, gives a fearful picture of the reasons which have so greatly augmented the use of Opium in our native land:—

"The quantity of quack medicines consumed by the poor is not merely enormous, but has been steadily increasing for the last ten years. For this there are two causes—one is the increased facility for advertisements by the multiplication of advertising papers, and by the reduction of the stamp-duty on advertisements; but the great and frightful cause is the increase of distress amongst the working population. This is one of the many horrible ramifications of the corn-and-cattle monopoly, which, while it has restricted commerce, and thus reduced mechanics' wages on the one hand, has, on the other, carefully hedged out, not only corn under a certain price, but every species of fresh meat at any price, and thereby driven the poor, not only to overwork themselves, but to seek to satisfy themselves by the most wretched and disease-inducing food; and, even those falling in quantity, to seek to deaden their natural appetite by gin, tobacco, opium, and quack spirits, under the delightful names of cordial, balm of Gilead, balm of Rakasah, and all kinds of nectars and nepethes. I have contemplated with horror the rapid increase of the consumption of opium, and its spirituous distillate, laudanum, within the last ten years. The ravenous ferocity with which opium-eaters enter the druggists' shops, when want of money has kept them from their dose beyond their accustomed time of using it, and the trembling impatience with which they watch the weighing of the drug, (every moment appearing to them an age,) and the avidity with which they will seize and tear off their wanted dose, and swallow it—they are frightful to be seen; yet must have been seen by many on such occasions. The extent to which this drug is administered by poor women to their children, too, is another crying evil, of which the humane public has little notion; and it is one for which there never will be found any remedy but the abolition of the abominable restrictions on the importation of food. The wretched mother, while her husband is thundering away in his room, for sixteen hours a-day, and her elder children are gone out to the factory, or elsewhere, to help to increase the scant family revenue, which, altogether, does not reach the point of sufficiency, and with, perhaps, two or three little half-starved and half-starved brats about her, has also one in the cradle. She has no snug nursery—she has no nurse—she cannot afford even to keep at home as a doting daughter for that purpose; but on the contrary, she has to cook the family food, such as it is, to wash and mend the family clothes; and, very probably besides this, to take in washing or other work. While she is busy at the wash-tub, the child wakes and cries. What shall she do? At night, while she and her husband should and must sleep, or they cannot go through their daily work, the child again wrangles and cries. What shall she do? There is nothing for it but to go to the druggist's shop for—A pennyworth of peace; and what that is, any body in Lancashire can tell you; and if you are not in Lancashire, it can—it is laudanum, or opium disguised in treacle, and termed in other places Godfrey's Cordial. It is in vain to remonstrate with the poor on this practice—they always ask you what they are to do, and think it unanswerable to add—'A pennyworth of peace is worth a penny.' Thus are the constitutions of the poor sapped and stupefied even in the cradle, and all the wisdom of England cannot point any remedy but that of taking off the violent pressure on the means of existence; and if that will not enable the poor of this country to live on bread and cheese and honest beef, instead of opium and quack medicines, then there will be nothing for it but their escaping to those new lands where they can."

A period of want, as it respects news, which might almost be called a famine, has been succeeded by a supply so exuberant, that ten days, at the lowest computation, will be required to digest it. Two Monthly Mails from England in seven days, filled, not with the stagnant uniformity of ordinary events, but announcing the extinction of two Ministries and Cabinets in four days,—and the death of Ranjeet Singh form a combination of editorial good fortune, which must be new even to the most experienced of our brethren. In the excitement which the events cannot fail to create, it would be idle to bespeak attention to local matters; and we have, therefore, we hope discreetly contracted our own lumberations within a suitable limit. At the same time, however, we have the pleasure of offering our readers an abstract of the Annual Meetings held in London, in the month of May, by the great religious and benevolent Societies. To a large portion of our readers, we are confident this summary will be interesting; to all of them we hope that the labour of reading and condensing such a mass of 'matter,' will appear sufficient to exonerate us from the suspicion of indolence. We fancy that when the Monthly Mail is established with that regularity which shall meet the public exigence and wishes, it will become necessary to divide the month between European and local politics. The least compliment we can pay the Mail is to reserve a week for meditating on its contents; this will still leave three-fourths of our time for local squabbles, and the national interests of India. Next week we hope to bring up a long array of local questions; the Post Office Reform of Capt. Taylor; the Half-yearly Report of the Agricultural Society; the Opium Question and Memorial; the Report of the Education Board, with many others, 'too numerous to particularly mentioned.'

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JULY 11.

The sailing of the Water Witch for Aden, which had been fixed for to-morrow morning, is postponed, according to one account through the non-arrival of Lord Auckland's despatches according to another, owing to the delay of the Bombay Hawk—Ranjeet Singh is, if the papers speak true, really dead without mistake. All the papers concur in the report of his death, which is said to have taken place on the 22d June.—Sometime since, the Commercial Advertiser announced a 'wonderful steam apparatus at Serampore, for effecting translations into the languages of the East. The Englishman of this morning announces that Messrs. Haworth, Hardman and Co., at the picturesque village of Cosipore, have carried the application of steam to a still farther extent, and have produced biscuits by that agency, equal to the best that are manufactured by the pastrycooks of Calcutta.—The fears which were entertained of the loss of the Optus Castle have proved too true. She was last seen off the Cape, at the close of last year, but had not reached England late in April.—The building of the Hengalee Scuiary in Calcutta is in such progress, that it is expected to be completed in three months. The Gyannaneshan announces that elementary works on Astronomy, Mathematics, Surveying, Law and Rhetoric are in course of translation; but no notice is given of any work on History, Geography or Statistics.—The Journal of Sayras states, that the King of Persia has prohibited the importation of British goods into his country.—The Bombay Hawk did not reach Calcutta yesterday. According to the law, therefore, which regulates communications by steam, viz. that their approach is announced by delay, the May Mail must be on the way.

FRIDAY, JULY 12.

The Bombay and Madras posts not having arrived, the Post Master General has announced that the despatch of the Water Witch will be postponed till 5 p.m. this day.—The little Theatre at Meerut is no more. The roof fell in, two hours before rehearsal. The fact is announced in the Englishman, but, unhappily, without any date.—The Opium traders of Calcutta have drawn up a memorial to the Privy Council in England, praying that the value of all the Opium sold in the years 1837, 1838 and 1839, which was delivered up to the Chinese Government, should be repaid to them with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. All that the petitioners want is the money paid down in Calcutta; and they are willing in that case to leave the adjustment of this burden to be made in England, between the East India Company and H. M. Government.—The force which is to proceed against Jemsheddah, will consist of a Regiment of Cavalry, one of European and one of Native Infantry, a troop of Horse, and a heavy detachment of Foot Artillery, with a large battering train. The whole will break ground about the 1st of September.

SATURDAY, JULY 13.

The May Mail, with intelligence in the 17th May, came in yesterday. A précis of the European intelligence brought by this opportunity, we present to our readers in a subsequent column. —The Water Witch is advertised to sail this day positively at twelve. She will be novel out fairly in view by the Enterprise Steamer. The Bombay dawk, with the letters for this vessel, has not arrived. —Letters from Cambalar state, that the boat was found to be excessive; the thermometer rising to 111 in the tents. An officer of the 10th Lancers, Lieut. Inverarity, had been murdered by the Natives, who appear to continue their depredations with perfect impunity. —A Delhi Gazette Extra announces the fact of Runjeet Singh's death, of which there can no longer be any doubt. He died on the 25th of June. The papers of this day are so filled with English intelligence of absorbing interest, that all local notices are omitted. —The Editor of the Delhi Gazette asks whether the Editorship of this journal has changed hands, because we described Sir Charles Metcalfe as a Tory, in reference to English politics. The Editor is unchanged, we can assure him; and so we believe are Sir Charles's political sentiments, which have generally been understood to be of the right Conservative stamp. As Lord Auckland goes home in March, 1841, and as we hope he will be succeeded by Sir Charles, we shall, probably, soon have an opportunity of settling this question.

MONDAY, JULY 14.

The Bombay letters had not arrived when the Water Witch took her departure on Saturday. —On that day a splendid vessel was launched at the Kidderpore Dock Yard, which had been built for the son of Runjeet Singh, Esq. She is 744 tons burden, and is built with great beauty and skill by a Parsee architect, Dronjeebhoy Runjeetjee. She was named the Runjeet Singh, by Mrs. W. F. Grant. A splendid tiffin was laid out at the charge of the liberal Secretaries of the Docking Company, in one of the working galleries, under a canopy of flags tastefully arranged. —The number of letters received at the Post Office for Bombay by the Water Witch, exclusively of those from the Eastward, was 5009. —Mr. Frith, an Attorney of the Supreme Court, was charged at the Police, on Saturday, by the Messrs. Pittar, with a double assault on them in their own shop. He was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of two hundred Rupees, a hundred for each assault. —A letter from Loodianah, published in the Englishman, fixes the date of Runjeet Singh's death on the 27th June, but the 25th is evidently the correct date. He appointed his eldest son, Kurruck Singh, his successor, and his new Minister, Dheeran Singh, to the same office under the new reign. The Harkara states that Runjeet has bequeathed the precious diamond, the Koh-i-noor, to the temple of Juggurath, in Orissa! —The same paper states, on the authority of letters from England, that had the Tories come into power, Lord Auckland would have been recalled, and Lord Heytesbury nominated in his stead. —The British Government having made serious complaints to the Portuguese authorities, regarding the marauding expedition which had entered the territories of our subsidiary, the Rajah of Nawat Waree, from Goa, a new Governor, with a suite of Secretaries, and a Regiment of nine hundred European soldiers, has been despatched from Portugal. —Last week the London Correspondent of the Harkara deprived the Disenters of one of their brightest ornaments, the Rev. Dr. J. P. Smith, whom he transformed into a clergyman of the established church. The Englishman is, however, more unkind. He has now robbed the Disenters of a still more illustrious name, by turning the great ROBERT HALL, —of whom Sir James Mackintosh said, "If you wish to know why all Greece ran to hear Demosthenes, go and hear Hall," —into a Bishop. Whether our contemporary intended this as a compliment, we know not; but it is ungenerous in the Press to rob Disent of its legitimate honors.

TUESDAY, JULY 15.

It is stated that Major Ross, the new Political Agent at Jeypore, has called upon the Ministers to produce the accounts kept during the time of their administration, which has annoyed and perplexed them in no ordinary degree, and they complain that they are no longer the rulers of the country. —The Loodianah Ukhar, with a black fringe round it, announces the death of Runjeet, on the twenty-fifth June, of palsy. —The Khan of Khilat, in Afghanistan, is to be deposed for the assistance which he has given to the marauders who have annoyed the British army in its progress. This man was the only Chief who, on the occasion of Shah Soojah's former expedition, afforded him a shelter in his adversity; and it is probable that he may intercede for his former benefactor. —A meeting of the Proprietors of the Union Bank took place yesterday, when the hopes which had been entertained of its giving a higher dividend than the Bengal Bank, by two or three per cent., were dissipated by the declaration of a dividend of precisely the same amount, Eight per cent. The reserved fund of 13,000 Rupees is to be augmented by fractional profits, till it reaches two lakhs of Rupees. Four new Directors were elected in the room of four whose time had expired. —The news from Caudahar is that the army is not to move before the 1st of July. Five hundred camp followers had contrived to get their discharge; but they had not proceeded far when they were attacked by the bands of prowling marauders, and almost all cut to pieces; a few only escaped naked and forlorn to the camp. —The Nawaab Mehly Kooley Khan, who came down the other day from Patna to Chitpore, and who has some knowledge of leechcraft, has, it is said, set up a dispensary, and cured every one who applied to him, (namely, three hundred and seventy-six persons,) with the exception of one man, "who had spun out the thread of his existence."

WEDNESDAY, JULY 17.

The Editor of the Harkara states, that Deboe Ramchond Ghose has purchased two thousand copies of the History of Bengal. This is an error; and as it may go the round of the Press, it should be stated that he purchased, for gratuitous distribution, One Hundred Copies, but that the sale of the work in the first six months amounted to nearly Ten Thousand Copies. —Minute guns were yesterday fired from the ramparts of Fort William, to announce the death of Runjeet Singh. —The Supreme Court, by a decision just made by Sir Edward Ryan, has allowed Natives to give evidence upon a solemn declaration, rather than upon oath. This concession to Native feeling was strenuously resisted by Mr. Clarke, but the objection was overruled by the Court. Strange that such a common sense procedure should not have been admitted into this Court during the sixty-five years in which it has been established. —Accounts from Darjeling are more favourable than they have been. The people from the plains continue to bring in supplies. —The sittings of the Supreme Court commenced on the 18th instant, with nine cases on the Lood. By some this paucity of cases is attributed to a growing indisposition to law, in the minds of the Natives, to which its costly nature has not a little contributed; by others it is said to be owing to the expected arrival of Mr. Furlan, for whom briefs, valued at 25,000 Rupees, are said to be waiting, in spite of the indignation of the House of Lords. —We had almost forgotten to mention that the Court of Directors have ordered the Charter of the Bank of Bombay to be given to the existing Proprietors; and not to those who originally petitioned for it.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

London Mail, with letters in the 17th May, were received in Calcutta on Friday last. The intelligence brought by this opportunity is of the most spirit-stirring character. On the 7th May, the Ministry, by the absence of Eight Liberals above the Tory absentees, but more especially by the desertion of Ten Liberal Members, in which number were included Mr.

Honrs Mr. Grote, Mr. Leader and Mr. Wakely, were left in a Majority of five, on the Bill for Suspending the Constitution of Jamaica; and considering that they had no longer the confidence of a sufficient majority of the House of Commons to be able to carry on the government of the country with vigour, resigned; and it is said at the same time advised Her Majesty to call the Conservatives and not the Radicals to her councils. The Queen sent for the Duke, but he declined the formation of a Ministry, on account of his age and infirmities, and referred Her Majesty to Sir Robert Peel, who was entrusted with the construction of a Cabinet. When the various offices had been parcelled out, Sir Robert waited on the Queen; and it appears that at that interview either he first demanded the liberty of re-constituting Her Majesty's household, or that he more fully explained his views. Her Majesty gave him leave to do as he would with the Lords, but the Ladies, who surrounded her, she would not allow him to touch. Sir Robert Peel then resigned the authority he had received for the construction of a Ministry. The Queen sent for Lord Melbourne, and the Whigs got again into the Ministerial saddle. The country rung with applause at the Queen's spirit in so promptly rejecting the insult offered to her by Sir Robert and the Tories, whose prospects of office are now considered to be more dreary than ever. It is said that the cast of Ministerial measures is to be more liberal than formerly, in order to propitiate the Radicals; and that the changes which are in contemplation, are to be forced on the Peers by a large creation. There are rumours that Sir Robert Peel found it impossible to construct a Cabinet to his own liking, and that in the outset he had to encounter the impracticability and sourness of Lord Stanley's temper, and that he made a show that he knew the Queen would refuse, that he might have a decent pretext for not making up a Cabinet. Others assert that Lord Melbourne fore-saw that the Tory Cabinet would split on the rock of the female non-resist, and resolved, in order to bring the Radicals to reason. All these conjectures may, doubtless, be cleared up some half a century hence, when the secret history of the times comes to be published. Lord Brougham is said to have been very sagacious, during the sheyness of Government, but neither party would take him on board; and he has, therefore, declared, that Lord John Russell has a soul no bigger than that of a titmouse.

The Speaker has resigned his post, on account of ill health. The announcement was received with regret, and he was complimented on his impartiality by both parties. Mr. Shaw Lefevre is the Whig, Mr. Goulburn the Tory candidate, for the post of First Commoner in England.

All Her Majesty's Regiments in India are to be put upon the War Establishment; recruiting was going forward with rapidity. As the Ministry are unable to spare more Regiments for India, the East India Company has been authorized to raise three additional European Regiments, one for each Presidency, which, if Government can be assured of the loyalty of the Company, is a wise step.

The Hereditary Grand Duke of Russia, after having made the tour of Europe, has visited England, where he has been received with the most distinguished honour. The Prince of Orange visited England at the same time.

In France, there has been an enquete, and attempts have been made to obtain possession of Paris, by an organized mob, who endeavoured to re-enact the barricade movement. The insurrectionary attempt was defeated, though not without some loss of life. The par interim Ministry has made way for a substantial Ministry, at the head of which is Marshal Soult, and among whose members is not the able Thiers.

The Ambassador from Persia, to the Court of England, bearing precious presents to the Queen, has received a severe rebuke from the English Minister at Paris; and he has been distinctly informed by Lord Palmerston, that he will not be received in England.

The Duke of Newcastle having refused to place in the Commission of the Peace two gentlemen, against whom the only objection was, that they were Dissenters, received a remonstrance from the Lord Chancellor, and returned an ungraciously reply. He was required to read the letter, which he refused to do, and was instantly removed from the post of Lord Lieutenant.

On the affairs of Canada, the papers contain scarcely a syllable. The disputed boundary question in North America, about which Congress bristled up, and voted supplies of men and money to carry on a war with England, appears to have died out. Maine has withdrawn her troops from the forest, and left the timber under charge of the civil officers of the Government of New Brunswick.

In Spain it is said that the case of Don Carlos is looking up; but whichever side gains the ascendant, it is but the triumph of butchers.

Sir John Campbell and Sir Frederick Pollock have given their opinion, that under the provisions of the New Charter, the Government of India cannot hold shares in any new bank; though they are not strictly forbidden to hold those which they possessed in any Bank under the former Charter.

Eight new Peers have been created, in consequence, it is said, of the vote of confidence, which the Commons passed on Her Majesty's Ministers.

A private association has been formed, for the purpose of colonizing New Zealand; twenty thousand pounds have been subscribed, and the first vessel has been equipped. A territory of six hundred thousand acres has been purchased from the Natives.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:—

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—The affairs of Great Britain, in connection with China, appear at this moment to be worthy of the consideration of every Englishman, let his profession be what it may. Under the influence of this impression, although not a member of the commercial community, I am induced to solicit a small part of the columns of your valuable journal, to call the attention of my countrymen to the real state of the matter at issue; a proceeding that appears to me essential, as they seem to be hurried into an erroneous conclusion, relative to the right of the British to adopt effectual means to exclude the importation of Opium into China, and punish every attempt to set in opposition to their laws. Have not the Chinese been exerting themselves for a considerable period to exclude Opium from their ports; and have not their endeavours been set at defiance, and their edicts been met with contempt and disobedience? Have the British authorities in Canton sincerely and strenuously used all the power and persuasion at their disposal to prevent the importation of Opium; and have they warned the merchants of the result of their persisting to set the laws and mandates of the Chinese at defiance? Are the British authorities in China justified in giving up the Opium they are said to have given up; or ought they not rather to have ordered all Opium, the property of British subjects, to be taken away, upon pain of confiscation, and the personal consequences attending an infraction of the Chinese laws? And would not the British authorities have acted wisely in arranging with the Chinese Commissioner for the confiscation of all Opium detected in China, or in ships in the ports of China, after a certain date, as well as all the property of the individuals to whom the Opium may have been consigned, and the ships on which it had been imported? Had such a line been adopted, it appears to me, that the loss accruing from the delivery of the Opium, and the stoppage of the trade, might have been avoided, and the British Government escaped being placed upon the horns of a most disagreeable dilemma, submission to the dictates of Chinese barbarism or war. Do, pray Mr. Editor, give us an enlightened article on this subject, founded upon material rights.

And oblige, yours,

THE LATE DR. PRICE OF AVA.

It is always matter of great satisfaction to the friends of missions, to receive favourable accounts of the fidelity and efficiency of their Missionaries. The labours of the Missionary, are of such a nature, that it is not always easy for those under whose auspices he labours, to judge accurately either of his devotedness or success. But as the missionary looks not to the applause of man for his reward, or his incentive to duty, he is willing to toil on, unknown and unpraised, till death, when he will no more need nor desire human approbation.

With the name of Dr. Price, one of the Missionaries of the Baptist Board, our readers are, to some extent, familiar, from his connection with Mr. and Mrs. Jackson during their sufferings in the Burman war. We are gratified in being able to give our readers the following facts concerning one, who from the peculiar nature of his labours and circumstances, has hitherto been little known. They were collected by Mr. Kinsaid, and communicated by him in a letter to a brother in Philadelphia, and published in the Baptist Record.

On reaching the city, in 1836, I passed over to Saguing, and sought out the tomb of the lonely Missionary. I was surprised, in passing along through the streets of this once royal city, to find every person, old and young, able to direct me, in my inquiries for the grave. I found it in one of the city burial grounds, just without the walls of the town. The only Englishman in Ava, at the time, Mr. Lane, had erected over the grave a small monument of bricks and lime; but it had become somewhat dilapidated. While I was gazing on this humble site, several Burmese and Kathagans came around, and began to inquire if I had ever known Dr. Price. I replied, that though I had never seen him, yet I came from the same country, and knew many of his friends, and had seen his children in Calcutta. Each one began to tell what they had seen him do, and what they had heard him preach. One told how he had cured the sick; another, how he had preached the Divine Law; and a third, how he had instructed in science the young nobles who came from the Palace. Not long after this, an elderly man, of very propensuous manners, called upon me; said he was from Saguing, and that Dr. Price had been his near neighbour; that he had the care of his two little boys some time, and felt very anxious to hear from them. When he heard the boys were well taken care of, the kind-hearted old man said to me, he would express the greatest attention and respect for Dr. Price; said he had heard him preach and pray on the Sabbath, and had assisted in placing him in the grave. The simple and feeling account which the benevolent old man gave of his friend and teacher, and the solicitude he manifested for the orphan children, were very affecting. He said that Dr. Price's custom was, to read a portion of the sacred Book, and then explain to his hearers its meaning; then urge them to put away their idols, and worship the eternal God, who made heaven and earth. From further conversation, I perceived the good old man had a correct knowledge of the Christian religion, though he had, evidently, never felt the renovating influence of the Holy Spirit. He invited me to come over to Saguing, and make that city my home; offering, at the same time, to give me land, on which to build a house. I had not been in Ava long, when some of the young nobles, who had been Dr. Price's students called on me. They gave me an account of their studies, and the rules they had observed. They boarded with Dr. Price, and every morning and evening attended family worship. In the evening, they all read the Scriptures for an hour, and then Dr. Price explained some of the verses, and prayed. They were required to be present every Sabbath; and every few days they were required to kneel before the King, to be examined. They manifested the greatest respect for the memory of their teacher; call themselves his disciples, and say they could never lose a father more.

After the late war between the English and Burmese, Dr. Price had a hospital; and great numbers of sick, blind, and lame were constantly coming to receive medical aid. I have seen several who had surgical operations performed on them. Among them is a young man who had not seen the light for several years; but after being under Dr. Price's care about two months, he so far obtained his sight, that he is able to discern all common objects, though he cannot read; and what is still more interesting, he gives considerable evidence of love to Christ, and has talked some of baptism.

By the earnest solicitations of Prince Mek-arah, (the King's uncle,) Dr. Price began an English and Burman dictionary, but did not live to finish it; Mr. Lane, a British merchant, has gone on and finished it; and it is considered so valuable a work, that the Burmese Government has offered to defray the expense of printing it. Besides this, Dr. Price translated Genesis, and Exodus; and good Burman scholars pronounce it well done. Prince M. and Prince S., together with many nobles, are often speaking of Dr. Price in the highest terms.

From these and similar facts, which have come under my notice, my views have entirely changed in reference to the value and usefulness of this forgotten Missionary. There are few men who, under so many difficulties, and in so short a time, under such and successfully prosecuted so much. Had he lived, he would have been a great blessing to the world, and all the nobility would have been trained under his influence; and that influence would have been felt through all coming time. Price began to lay a broad foundation. He was determined to enlighten the rising generation, and he would have done it, had his life been spared. It is gratifying to learn that the Bible was made a school-book in this school; and that the young men were taught to kneel before the Father of their spirits. I never knew, till since living in Ava, that Dr. Price suffered more than any other foreigner; but, all the rest, taking advantage of Sir Archibald Campbell's offer, brought in a bill of all the money, furniture, books, clothing, &c., which they had lost during the war; and Sir Archibald required the Burman Court to pay them up to the last farthing. Dr. Price, however, remaining under the Burman Government, could not take advantage of Sir Archibald's favour, and so lost every thing but life. When Brother Brown was here, he saw so much evidence of Dr. Price's usefulness, that he was so much disappointed, and so much at a loss to account for the injury done to his memory, as I had been before.

during the week; such as publishing in their handbills that Mr. Pallister and his friends would be present to advocate their (Christian) principles at the forum, when they had no authority for such expectation. Last the public, however, should be imposed upon, the friends of Mr. Pallister issued a bill, stating they should not be in attendance, and clearing the Overtures with denegatory falsehood. In addition to the above ruse to obtain money, there has been a dancing party, something after the manner of the two-penny hup, which have done so much towards demoralizing our youth.—Sheffield Mercury.

MEDIATION OF SAINTS.—The Runic Church commenced on the 25th January, a period of forty days to be devoted to prayers, in order to obtain of God, through the mediation of the holy Virgin, the exaltation of the holy church and the conversion of sinners, Protestants, particularly in England, and of unbelievers. The archbishop particularly recommended the faithful to invoke Saint Denis, Saint Vincent de Paul, and Sainte Genevieve.—Liquette.

BARON ROTHSCHILD was lately presented to the Pope. The wealthy Jew availed himself of the opportunity of procuring some privileges for his brethren within the papal dominions.—Christ. Adv.

RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCE AT CLEVELAND.—An assemblage of the populace have committed various excesses against the Protestants and the Protestant churches, and the riot was not quelled till three in the morning. This disturbance appears to have arisen from the publication of a pamphlet intended to refute another against the Protestant religion. The disturbance terminated in the arrest of several of the ringleaders.—Ibid.

DIASCELYS IN SWITZERLAND.—Switzerland appears to have been lately agitated for some weeks past in consequence of the election of Dr. Strauss, the author of Das Leben Jesu, to a theological professorship at the University of Zurich. After protracted struggles between the different parties, the election has been cancelled, and a pension of one thousand francs has been voted to the disappointed candidate, in whose place Dr. Hoffmann, of Wittenberg, a avowed antagonist to the religious doctrines of Strauss, has been invited to accept the vacant chair at Zurich.—Courier.

PROGRESS OF CATHOLICISM IN BAVARIA.—The Catholic clergy are actively engaged in undermining the Protestant religion in Bavaria, with the full sanction of the King. Six sisters of the congregation of St. Eulalie opened on the 1st June last, a school in the royal palace of Nymphenburg, in Munich, at which young girls of the nobility, both Catholic and Protestant, were to be admitted. The children of the last persuasion were to be instructed in their religion by Lutheran and Calvinist ministers. The establishment being intrusted by the Court, most of the distinguished families of Bavaria placed their daughters therein, and the conditions of the prospectus as regarded religion were for some time strictly complied with. The nuns, however, aided by several Catholic clergymen, laboured to convert the Protestant children to Catholicism. In December four publicly renounced their religion. A Judge of the Supreme Court of Appeals, being informed that the same had prevailed on his daughter, a child ten years old, to become a Catholic, immediately took proceedings against the managers of the school and a Jesuit of Dillingen who had received her abjuration. The nuns proceeded in justification of their conduct, a letter from the minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, by whom they were authorized to use all their influence to convert to Catholicism the young Protestant girls committed to their care. The trial will shortly come on before the criminal court of Munich.—Le Droit.

MORAVIAN EMIGRANTS.—A letter from Magdeburg of the 7th inst. states that 300 persons of the Lutheran persuasion in that province, and other parts of the Prussian dominions, intend to emigrate to North America in the month of May.—Pat.

EDUCATION.

INFANT SCHOOL SOCIETY.—The third annual meeting of this excellent institution was held on Friday week at the Hanser-square rooms; the Earl of Chesterfield presided. The report expressed a doubt whether any Government would give to the people an education sufficiently religious; and would therefore prefer confining legislation on the subject to manufacturing districts, where the rising generation are in a state to render Government interference absolutely necessary. It expressed regret that the great educational societies did little for the metropolis itself, supporting only their model schools; and adverted to this as one main cause why the population of London is nearly the worst educated in England. It complained especially of the want of local infant schools, as parents will not send their children to any distance, expressing at the same time its willingness to establish ten such schools in the metropolis, if the necessary funds (estimated at 1,000*l.*) were placed at their disposal for the purpose. The amount of grants hitherto made in aid of infant schools had not reached 40*l.*; but these are stated to have been very useful. This institution has permanent accommodation for 33 teachers; they are kept 15 weeks; 280 have already been sent out, of whom 140 were members of the Established Church, but even that number had been inadequate to the increasing demand. The committee expressed great satisfaction that a great normal school is about to be established at Liverpool; and hoped the example will be extensively followed, as they deprecate the course pursued at Chesham, and other places, of sending out teachers without any instruction, except what was given in the school. During the past year the society has trained 18 teachers for the colonies and for foreign service; and they are expecting to send a teacher to Smyrna, and one to Egypt. Sixteen persons have learnt the system to nursery governesses. The finances of the society are stated to be flourishing—the receipts 1,850*l.*, the expenditure 1750*l.*, the outstanding liabilities about 200*l.* Resolutions were moved and seconded by Captain V. Harcourt, R. N.; the Rev. W. Mackenzie, the Rev. James Cumming, Mr. Labouchere, Captain Hume, Mr. Ponsall, Dr. Sandwith, the Hon. Captain Waldegrave, and General M. Innes. (This institution appears to have received a political bias on the Tory side.)—Christ. Adv.

CUNEIFORM HYPOTHESE.—Two hundred presentations for the admission of children were on Friday submitted to the committee, being the largest number ever known. Mr. Alderman Thompson, M. P., president of the institution, has presented 4000*l.* to found two exhibitions for ever to Oxford or Cambridge.—Ibid.

SCHOOLS IN TURKEY.—Seven academies are to be established in Turkey, at the cities of Constantinople, Adrianople, Salonica, Brussa, Smyrna, Bagdad, and Trebizond, where, among other sciences, Mathematics, Physics, and Chemistry, are to be especially taught. The government of that country now think, that the only way to cure a number of prejudices is to make real knowledge more general. The lectures are to be delivered in French and in Turkish, and the Sultan has requested the Academy of Science in Paris to send him some young professors. In the academies of Constantinople, Smyrna, and Salonica, Grammar, Geography, and History are to be taught in French, after the European manner. The professors are to have a fixed salary, and a pension on retirement.—Athenaeum.

SCIENTIFIC.

POWERFUL ELECTRICITY.—Sunday week Andrew Cox, Esq., delivered a lecture on atmospheric electricity, at Finsbury, illustrated by a number of beautiful experiments. He illuminated 400 feet of iron chain, hung in festoons about the room, the whole extent being brilliantly lighted at the same instant of time, as a passage through it of the spark from a battery; and introduced several feet of wire. Mr. C. afterwards directed the combustion of large experiments on thunder clouds and winds. By means of a wire apparatus set up in his park, he had discovered that a dry lightning swept in masses, alternately negatively and positively electrified; and once the accumulation of the electric fluid in a fog was so great, that there was an incessant stream from his conductor of sparks, each one of which would have struck an elephant dead in an instant.—Pat.

OIL FOR LAMP GLASS.—Oil of olives is refined for the matchmakers by the following simple process. Into a bottle or phial containing it, a slip of sheet lead is immersed, and the bottle is placed at a window, above it may receive the rays of the sun. The oil by degrees gets covered with a curdy mass, which after some time settles to the bottom, while itself becomes limpid and colourless. As soon as the lead ceases to separate any more of the white substance, the oil is decanted off into another phial for use.—Dr. Ure's Dict. of Arts. Part VII.

VACCINATION AND RE-VACCINATION.—In Württemberg during six years, twenty thousand were successfully re-vaccinated out of forty-four thousand; nine thousand with modified effect; leaving fifteen thousand on whom the re-vaccination would take no effect. Now, on the supposition that in this country the same ratio would be obtained by experiment on an extended scale, it must be clear that re-vaccination should not be neglected, more especially in large towns where the small-pox is constantly raging, and, we fear, will not be thoroughly extinguished until the Legislature can be brought to think and enact on behalf of the poor, who now, to a very large extent, neglect to do so for themselves. It is, however, pleasing to observe that a greater confidence in vaccination is obtaining among the working classes; and from the Report of the London Vaccine Institution of the present year, it appears that in the year 1850, 4,075 were vaccinated, but in the last year, (1858,) 8,360; showing an increase of more than double.—Christ. Advocate.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LORD FOXBOROUGH, Ambassador to Turkey, has been made Viscount Ponsonby, of Imokilly, in the county of Cork, and Sir James Frederick Lamb, Ambassador to Austria, has been created Baron Beaulieu, of Beaulieu, in the county of Nottingham.—Christ. Adv.

THE CITY POLICE.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL announced his intention of moving to expunge from the Police Bill, "the first fourteen clauses, which extended the Metropolitan Police to the City of London."—Christ. Ad.

THE AMERICAN BOUNDARY QUESTION.—Lord Palmerston moved on Tuesday, in reply to a question from Sir William Adolphus, that he had sent to Mr. Fox, at Washington, the draft of a convention, with a view to the appointment of a joint commission to define the boundary between Maine and New Brunswick, and when the reply of the American Government was received, the papers should be laid on the table.—Lit.

THE EXPORTATION OF THE PRINCIPAL METALS from the port of London for the week ending on Saturday last, March 23, amounted, according to the official returns, of 18,291 ounces of gold bars, 4,911 ounces of gold coin, 82,181 ounces of silver bars, and 20,000 ounces of silver coin. Of the gold bars, 3,150 ounces were shipped off for Rotterdam, and 13,141 for Hamburg; of the gold coin 3,500 for Hamburg, and 1,110 for Cologne. The silver coin was thus disposed of:—4,220 to the British West Indies, and 77,891 to Madras and Calcutta. All the silver bars were sent to Madras.—Pat.

NAVAL HARBOUR OF REFUGE.—The Lords of the Treasury have sanctioned the survey of the eastern coast of England, not alone for the purpose of building forts, as in general reports, but also for the purpose of constructing harbours of refuge for Her Majesty's smaller vessels of the royal navy against the easterly and north-easterly gales. Lowestoft, Southwold, Holesly Bay, and Harwich harbours offer the most eligible sites for the purpose above named; and amongst these Harwich is understood to have a decided preference. In these works of the government it is not intended to prevent private companies from making inner basins or inland harbours. It is said that the Harwich southern pier will be made to terminate in a six-gun battery, and that a pier of a similar form will commence from the seawater, and terminate fifty yards from the other pier-head. This will be accessible at all times of the tide, and will be known by a green light.—Exeter Times.

Mr. KERR has purchased a large tract of land in Trebovir, which is to be laid out for a town under the style and title of New Birmingham.—British Emancipator.

THE ASSIZES.—The Judges are still, April 13, on the circuit. The cases of murder, manslaughter, and stealing with intent to sell, are very numerous. At Taunton, three cases of that description came in succession. One prisoner having been found guilty of manslaughter, Baron Gurney, in passing sentence of transportation for life, said it was really necessary to try the effect of severe punishment in stopping "this horrid practice of resorting to deadly weapons for the purpose of settling personal quarrels."—Christ. Ad.

DISCOURAGEMENT OF LITIGATION.—At the recent assizes, Mr. Baron Alderson refused costs to the plaintiffs on all the cases for which the verdict went for the defendants. The consequence will be, that the plaintiffs will, in many cases, be out of pocket, even after obtaining a verdict in their favour. His lordship said the judges had determined upon strictly adhering to this rule, in consequence of the unnecessary multiplication of lawsuits.—London Paper.

Thomas Hastings Murchison, aged 21, was found guilty of the manslaughter of his fellow-pupil Joseph Alop, on Saturday, at the Central Criminal Court, and committed to three years' imprisonment in Cold-bath-fields prison. This mitigated penalty was offered in consideration of his subsequent penitence. Mr. Justice Coleridge, who having had the opportunity of preventing the catastrophe and neglecting to enforce it, Sir F. Pollock conducted the prosecution, and the Attorney-General the defence.—Christ. Ad.

UNIFORM PENNY POST.—Upwards of 320 petitions, with 38,700 signatures, have been presented to the Commons during the present session, including the merchants, bankers, and inhabitants of 144 principal and other towns, 73 town-councils, 19 chambers of commerce, 9 commissions of supply in Scotland, and 1 grand jury in England, 8 fire and life insurance companies, 9 mechanics' institutes, 27 printing-offices and bodies of printers, and various other societies and individuals throughout the kingdom.—Ibid.

COMPLIMENT TO THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—The Watchman of Wednesday last (10th) says in a leading article:—"We respect the Established Church." It is "the rock from whence we were born, and the whole of the pit from whence we were dugged."—Pat.

Mr. CARLILE has announced a course of six lectures on the Revolutions of modern Europe. They are to be given in the lecture-room of the Marylebone Institution, and to commence on the 1st of May.—Ibid.

THE WREATH.—Old Mrs. Wesley sang "Pious orgies" before Queen Charlotte, "when upwards of 70 years of age, clad in her primitive cap and apron."—Ibid.

EXTRAORDINARY WILL.—A few days since we mentioned that Mr. Wright, formerly a door-keeper in the House of Commons, expired at his residence in Beumont street, Marylebone, leaving property to the amount of between 150,000*l.* and 200,000*l.*, a great portion of which he had divided among his wife (his third), his friends, and servants; we learn that the remainder is bequeathed to the children of his only daughter, who is now but three years of age. "If she have any," with the restriction, however, that none of them be permitted to "keep a carriage." Since the death of the testator, an clearing away of the rooms of his late habitation, one of the servants discovered a small box of antiquated appearance, and on being opened it was found to contain nothing but 10*l.* notes, to the amount of nearly 200*l.*—Ibid.

LOYALTY.—On a sign painted over the door of the Three Tuns public-house, whence Mr. Bushe's munition starts, it is written, "Pareils bucket and carried to all parts of the Queensdom?"—Anti-Slavery Messenger.

A DRINKABLE MASON'S BREWERY.—An advertisement appeared in the Morning Advertiser a day or two since relative to a public-house, which, by way of remuneration, was stated to be "situate in a gin-drinking neighbourhood."

FOOLING.—The Tournament at Eglinton Castle is fixed to take place in the early part of September. The festivities will continue upwards of a week, three days being devoted to the tilting or charging with the ancient lance, which is of uncommon length, and considerably heavier than the modern one of the present day; and this will, of course, be made known to those stranger knights, who, it is confidently asserted, will throw down the gauntlet, and demand the right to display their prowess. The knights, about thirty in number, will be attended by two esquires, bowmen, and numerous retainers.—Pat.

SIXTY-NINETEEN CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS have been brought under instruction at the Brighton Chimney-sweepers' School since its establishment in 1834. The school is open on three evenings in the week, the boys attending in their working-dresses.—Ibid.

LAUGHTER.—No man who has once heartily and wholly laughed can be altogether irreligiously bad; how much lies in laughter!—the cipher-key wherewith we decipher the whole man! Some men wear an everlasting barren slumber, in the smile of others lies a mild glitter as of ice, the forest are able to laugh what can be called laughing, but only soft and sifter and sifter from the throat onwards, or at best produce some whiff of lanky eccentricism as if they were laughing through wool. Of none such comes good. The man who cannot laugh, is not only fit for treason, stratagems, and spoils, but his whole life is already a treason and a stratagem.—Thomas Carlyle.

PRINTING OF THE BIBLE IN SCOTLAND.—Lord Advocate MENZIES called, in reply to Sir George Clerk, that the patent of Queen's printer for Scotland, which will expire on the 17th of July, would not be renewed, but that measures would be taken to secure the accurate printing of the Holy Scriptures.—Christ. Ad.

THAMES TUNNEL.—On Tuesday afternoon, March 26, between one and two o'clock, another sudden irruption of water into the Thames Tunnel took place, which will cause a delay of the works for about a fortnight. The men at work had a narrow escape. Numerous quantities of clay were immediately thrown over the place which had broken in.—Pat.

BRASSIES. April 10.—The Lodge Journals of the 9th bring some details of the explosion in the coal mines of Morlaix, and give reasons to fear that the number of victims is the greatest that ever occurred on such an occasion. We are not yet informed of the whole truth, but what we already know is sufficient to excite the deepest sorrow. The number of workmen who perished is not precisely known; 70 lamps were distributed, but sometimes a workman takes two lamps. It is thought that there may have been about 70. Up to nine in the morning of the 9th about 40 dead bodies had been got out, and six workmen, more or less burnt, came out of the pit alive. All possible care has been taken of them.—Ibid.

THE HEREDITARY GRAND DUKE OF RUSSIA.—His Imperial Highness's projected marriage with an Austrian Arch-Duchess has failed. A very piquant anecdote proves that all hopes of a matrimonial alliance with the house of Hapsburg are at an end. Count Orloff, who had been commissioned to ascertain the dispositions of the Court of Vienna, addressed himself with such view to the Princess de Metternich, and expressed to her his great admiration of the charming Arch-Duchess, the object of his master's conjugal ambition. "The Arch-Duchess," replied the witty and malicious Princess, "is a truly fascinating person; unfortunately her health is so delicate that it will be impossible for us to settle her anywhere but in Italy, the air of which country is absolutely necessary to her." Upon this the Count made a profound and cool bow to the Princess, and dispatched a courier to St. Petersburg. The splendid reception given to the Grand Duke at Vienna has been but a courteous method of rejecting a suitor who is not wanted. This will but increase the rapour of Nicholas towards the Austrian Cabinet, which has already so much offended him by its treaty with Rug land. In that commercial arrangement the Danube is considered as a wholly Austrian stream, to which Russia has no right.—Brussels Paper.

KIEV.—The Russian Government has been obliged to break up the University of St. Vladimir at Kiev, on account of the secret societies for the overthrow of Russian domination which pervaded the University.—Pitt.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.—The North-east boundary line has been the subject of national controversy ever since the Treaty of Ghent, in 1814. From the period of the definitive Treaty of Peace in 1793, thirty years before, a question upon that topic had never arisen. Now would any disputed claim have appeared till this day, had it not been ascertained during the war from 1812 to 1815, that no land communication between Quebec and Halifax existed through the northern part of the state of Maine, unless by a route so circuitous that it is equivalent to a non-intercourse. Two facts in this connexion are remarkable. The whole contested territory at present is not worth a good farm near Boston or London; and the treaty which defines the boundary is just as evident as water flowing in its course. A more easily decided question can scarcely be proposed, because the current of water is both visible and tangible. The whole disputed territory would be desert and criminally purchased, by the equipment of one military brigade, the desolation of one farm, or the loss of a single human life. The north-east corner of Maine, a territory of granite and snow, which are its chief staple commodities, will never be extensively inhabited until the more genial southern climes are so densely peopled, that it will require the use of other streams for sawing mills, and other pine wood for steam factories; but this ought to happen under our earliest unimpeding the joyful change immediately anterior the millennium, before which time Britain and America will have forgotten the art of war, and their Governments will be of one heart and one soul; great grace will be upon them all in Canada and in Maine. Hasten, O Lord, that happy day!"—Electric Review.

UNITED STATES BANK.—A highly important return was made to Congress at its close, in relation to the banks of the United States. It appears that at the close of 1838, the aggregate of all the banks in loans was.....$69,746,987 dol.

Specie on hand.....$9,470,069

Circulation.....100,470,684

Deposits.....78,192,702

The increase of specie over the quantity in the United States at the close of 1837, was 4,253,931. James Gordon Bennett, an able financial writer, says that the excess of imports over exports is—1836 was.....$1,816,095 dol.

1838 .....10,351,806

1836 was the great and unfortunate year of over-trading; 1837, that of the panic and suspension of specie payments.—Philadelphia Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle.

PROPOSED SHIP CANAL ACROSS THE Isthmus of PANAMA.

—The following resolution, accompanied by a report and voluminous appendices, interspersed with sundry maps and diagrams, was presented to the House of Representatives from the committee on roads and canals by Mr. Mercer, on Saturday, the 22d inst. The resolution was adopted by the House, and the report, &c. ordered to be printed. "Resolved.—That the President of the United States be requested to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with those of the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus that connects North and South America, and to which the United States have accredited Ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of opening a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus; and of securing for ever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canals in all nations, on the payment of reasonable tolls."—New York Paper.

JAMAICA.—On Tuesday, Mr. Labouchere moved for leave to bring in a bill "to make temporary provision for the government of Jamaica." He expressed much regret that the measure he proposed had been rendered necessary by the course which the Assembly of Jamaica had pursued. That body, at their meeting in October last, had positively refused to pass any bills, except such as were required for the discharge of engagements to the public creditor. The House would recollect that Parliament had seen fit to enact a bill for the regulation of prisons in the West Indies; but not until five applications had been unsuccessfully made to the Jamaica Assembly to induce that body to pass a bill which should prevent the enormities proved to be common in the prisons of the island. Under the system of slavery, punishments were generally administered by the master on his own estate, and therefore the state of the prisons was a matter of little consequence comparatively; but, after the emancipation of the Negroes, offences were punished by imprisonment and discipline in prison. It had become usual to commit Negroes to goal for trifling offences, and then punish them severely on the pretence of breaches of prison discipline. It was proposed by the report of Captain Fringing, who had been specially employed to examine the state of the prisons, and the dispatches of Lord Elgin and Sir Lionel Smith to Lord Glenelg, that women were shut in the tread-mill for twenty-four successive hours, and that a coroner's jury had returned a verdict, that she died from "epoplexy, caused by excitement!" It appeared from other statements communicated by the Governors of Jamaica, that the flogging of women in goal was a common practice; "as in St. Ann's district it passed off almost as a matter of course." Mr. Labouchere read several documents to this effect. Measures which had been taken for the protection of the Negroes during the term of apprenticeship, became of no effect when the apprenticeship was abolished; and the Assembly, as had been said, absolutely refused to enact any bill as a substitute for those measures, for the better regulation of prisons and the prevention of the shocking enormities he had detailed. Under these circumstances, the Government had introduced the Jamaica Prisons Bill, which was carried last session. The measure passed the Lords unanimously; Lord Ellenborough, who was well acquainted with Colonial subjects, declaring his entire approbation, after careful perusal, of the bill. It passed the Commons unanimously—indeed, substantially; but not without the knowledge of gentlemen connected with Jamaica; for Mr. Burge presented a protest against it to the Colonial Office, a copy of which protest was moved for by the Marquis of Cholmondeley. The spirit which actuated the Assembly of Jamaica, appeared from a resolution which they passed on receiving a bill to amend the Apprenticeship Act, parts of which Mr. Labouchere read to the House:—"This House does not dread a comparison with the Commons of England in the measures of their legislation. Our laws have not been defiled, as by the Irish opponents of tithes; murders are not committed in our island by organized armies met in open day; nor do bands prowl about at night writing fire and rape and late in Dublin and Glasgow, to raise wages, even by means and murder. Our courts are never clogged with the abominations which disgrace England, nor do our husbands and daughters resort to them to expose their own shame for a money-price. The horrible trade of Burke, (and, we fear, of many more,) which has given a new word to the English language, was never heard of here; nor have we ever known an instance of parents putting their infant families to death, to save them from the protracted sufferings of starvation. It is not in Jamaica that unfortunate mothers outrage nature, by the destruction of their new-born offspring, to avoid the cruel persecution of a hard-hearted and destroying morality; nor is it under our laws that wretches commit suicide to escape the refuge which is provided for worn-out and aged industry. We have no Corn-laws to add to the wealth of the rich, nor poor-laws to imprison, under pretence of maintaining, the poor. We cannot, as the English Parliament does, boast of a pauper law which has taken millions from the necessities of the destitute, to add to the luxuries of the wealthy." * * *

Was an Assembly, capable of using such language as this in a deliberate state paper, fit to legislate for the population of Jamaica? He might be told that it would be better to wait, until the exercise of their elective rights by the Negro population brought its own remedy to the evil; but under the present registration-laws the Negro population would be incompetent to exercise any elective rights for the next fifteen months; and although, at the expiration of that period, there was reason to believe that, from the laxness of the qualification, that class of the community would exercise a considerable—a preponderating influence in the House of Assembly—yet he thought it would be very unadvisable to allow the House of Assembly to go on legislating in the spirit they had manifested for fifteen months, as the prospect that, at the end of that period, there would be introduced into the Assembly a preponderating number of persons representing a class of persons smarting under their injuries, irritated and aggrieved. He proposed to suspend the constitution of Jamaica for five years, so that the Government should be administered by the Governor and Council, with three Commissioners to assist the Council with their advice.—Christ. Ad.

THE LEGISLATURE OF BARBADOS have to-enacted the barbarous punishment of flogging. Thirty-nine lashes may be inflicted on any prisoner, for any breach of prison discipline, at the discretion of any magistrate.—British Emancipator.

NEGRO POPULATION.—The negro population of Africa is supposed to amount to very near a hundred millions. In America the negro race may be taken at eight millions, the European of twenty.—Quarterly Review.

THE OPIUM MEMORIAL.—The merchants of Calcutta have just transmitted a Memorial to Her Majesty's Privy Council, respecting the loss they have sustained by the delivery of Twenty Thousand Chests of Opium, through Her Majesty's Superintendent, to prevent the massacre of Her Majesty's subjects, and a repetition of the horrors of Amboyna, Japan, Calcutta and Manila. Upon the general question of an indemnity and its desirableness, we do not think there can exist much diversity of opinion. While we rejoice that the trade has been brought to a close, and that the energy displayed by the Chinese Government affords a hope that the door will not again be opened to this pernicious drug, it is greatly to be wished that the merchants could be secured from all loss. But the great difficulty in to ascertain from what source the indemnification is to be derived. The Memorialists evidently look with the cheerfulness of hope to the Company's Exchequer. They would have no objection, indeed, to receive the amount from Her Majesty's Government; but as the Ministry may find it inconvenient to pay down the requisite sum, which is very likely to be the case, they most respectfully submit that the East India Company should be required to pay their demands at once. It must be obvious that any demand of this nature should have been made, in the first instance, of those who are expected to pay it; and that on their refusal, an appeal might have been addressed, with propriety, to a superior authority. The petitioners, however, doubtless persuaded themselves that the shortest road to the attainment of their wishes was to address the Cabinet of England. The Company will, it is to be presumed, pertinaciously resist the payment, even though Sir John Hobhouse should threaten them with a second mandamus. That they will be able to prevent very strong reasons against the demand, must be apparent, from the elaborateness of the reasoning by which the Memorialists endeavour to fix the responsibility of this heavy loss on them. In this respect we think the Memorial deficient. It appears to us to have failed in establishing the link in these transactions which is necessary, in order to render the Company either legally or equitably accountable for the misfortune which has overtaken the merchants. The Company were no party to the appointment of Capt. Elliot, and cannot, therefore, be involved in the pecuniary responsibility of his measures. But then it is said, that the manufacture of Opium has enriched India, and covered vast tracts with smiling fields and a flourishing population. All this may be abundantly true, without binding the Company to make good the loss occasioned through the confiscation of the Opium, by an agency over which they had no control. According to the usual conditions of sale, the responsibility of the vender ceased with the delivery of the goods,—except in the event of their turning out inferior,— and the risk of the purchaser commenced with the receipt of them, and continued through every stage of their progress from the Opium godown in Calcutta, to the hands of the merchant in China. In the present case, moreover, the Company are the manufacturers of the article; the merchants, the dealers in it. It is stated in the Memorial that the manufacturers have enjoyed the lion's share of the profit in this venture; one, two, and sometimes five hundred per cent., while the dealers have been obliged to content themselves with ten or twelve per cent. This is a fortunate circumstance for the manufacturer, but we cannot see how it can bind him to make good the merchants' loss. Equally true is it, as the Memorial states, that the manufacturers have, in every instance, consulted the wants and wishes of the consumers; and that they have made occasional consignments on their own risk to China, to ascertain whether a new mode of packing would not be more acceptable to the Chinese. This proves that they have been a pains-taking and discreet body of manufacturers, but still it does not, in our apprehension, shew that they have thereby rendered themselves answerable for the merchants' loss. The arbitrary Chinese authorities, who have confiscated the Opium, through their ignorance of those true principles of political economy, which would have taught them that the oozing out of the silver was not of itself a national calamity, might, with equal caprice, have ordered the delivery of all the cotton piece goods, which the merchants had imported from Manchester and Glasgow. According to the reasoning of the Memorial, Her Majesty's Government might then have been required to call on the cotton manufacturers to indemnify the merchants; for whatever has been predicated of the Opium, might be predicated also of the manufacture of Cotton. Its manufacturers have consulted the wants and wishes of the consumers with even greater care and assiduity, than the Company in the preparation of the Opium. This manufacture has, in our native land, turned hamlets into cities unrivalled in wealth and magnificence; it has poured millions into the national treasury; it has endowed private individuals with the wealth of princes; but not one of these considerations would, we are sure, be sufficient to convince the manufacturers that they were liable for the loss to which the caprice of the Chinese Government might subject the merchant, or to persuade Her Majesty's Government to make any such demand on them. And we do not see any reasoning in the Memorial which places the liability of the Company on more satisfactory grounds.

We turn to the alternative. Will Her Majesty's Ministers practically sanction the indemnification which has been guaranteed by their own Superintendent? The English Exchequer is the legitimate source from which the reimbursement should come; but the difficulties appear to gather more thickly around the subject the longer we look at it. It would avail little to say that the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers will be regulated by the character of Captain Elliot's instructions, and by the extent of authority with which he was vested. The present crisis was so utterly improbable and unexpected; the idea of the Chinese Government showing such pluck, so completely beyond the region even of imagination, that no instructions, with however large a margin, can be supposed to have made any provision for it. Her Majesty's Ministers may find it convenient to say, that Capt. Elliot exceeded his instructions; that in so promptly offering to give the Opium up to confiscation, he exhibited a de-iciency both of judgement and courage; and they may exonerate themselves from a responsibility which has neither precedent nor analogy. They may sacrifice Capt. Elliot to save the pockets of the nation. But even supposing the Ministry to feel disposed to uphold the guarantee, they must go to Parliament for the money, and there the hopes of the Manorialists must, we fear, be faint and low. There will, doubtless, be a vast display of virtuous indignation. When the nation is called to indemnify smugglers to the extent of a million or two sterling, it is but natural to expect a display of the most brilliant eloquence. The enormity of these transactions will be painted in the deepest colours. The moral virtue of Parliament, which is, indeed, the abstract and essence of the national virtue, will be roused into exercise: the abandoned East India Company, who engaged in the manufacture of poison for the great empire of China, and the still more abandoned merchants of Calcutta, who encouraged them in this nefarious enterprise, by purchasing up all that they could manufacture, will be denounced in terms of blistering indignation—but the Indemnity Bill we fear will be ordered to be read that day six months. If, however, the two Houses and Her Majesty's Ministers should take up high and disinterested ground upon this solemn occasion, and resolve to vindicate the national faith, pledged by a national representative, at whatever cost; should they unite in preferring honour to pelf, a commission will, probably, be appointed to ascertain the exact value of Opium at Canton, on the day of the confiscation, after the imperial proclamation had made it death to buy, sell or smoke it. Happy, indeed, should we be, if the merchants could be paid in full all that they have themselves paid for the Opium, but we dare not foster expectations which appear so illusory.

THE BOMBAY BANK.—The Court of Directors have, it seems, taken a different view of the question 'to whom the shares of the Bombay Bank should be assigned,' from that which was taken by the Legislative Council, and by the entire Press of this Presidency. They have negatived the plan of exposing the shares to auction, and devoting the profits to some object of public utility at Bombay. Though we cannot but think that the abandonment of a fund which, if converted to the use of the public, might have been productive of permanent benefit, is still open to criticism, notwithstanding the decision of the Court, yet the injustice which appeared to mark the demands of the Joint Stock Proprietors, has been obviated, partly by the subsequent development of facts, and partly by the orders of the Directors. That injustice appeared to be two-fold. First; by the express injunctions of the Home Government, that our servants were supposed to be precluded from investing their savings in the advantageous shares of a bank. It was subsequently announced that this restriction had been removed; but at the period when the list of those Proprietors who demanded the exclusive possession of the shares at par, was drawn up, the prohibition was considered to be in full force; and hence it appeared an act of injustice to distribute the shares on the basis of a schedule by which the public servants should be excluded from all participation in the original profits of the Bank. But the explanations afforded by the Press at the sister Presidency, have informed us that the restriction had been so far considered a dead letter before it was formally rescinded, that the List embraced the names of various individuals in the different branches of the Service. Secondly; it was known that a large proportion of those who originally petitioned the Court of Directors for a Chartered Bank, had refused to join the Association subsequently formed with the view of establishing a Joint Stock Bank, if a Charter was denied. It was this Association which demanded the exclusive possession of the shares of the Chartered Bank. It appeared, therefore, to be an act of the clearest injustice to accede to their wishes, and thereby to exclude from all participation in the benefits of a Chartered Bank, so large a number of those who had been among the foremost to urge its establishment. On this subject it is admitted in the Bombay Times, that the despatch of the Court of Directors of September, 1838, was not clear. It is now affirmed that the Directors have suggested an amicable arrangement of the claims of those who were elected from the body of the Proprietors of the Joint Stock Bank, (though not from the Chartered Bank.) And it is stated with confidence, that from the moderation of the Provisional Committee no difficulty is anticipated in this adjustment.

RUNJEET SING.—The death of Runjeet Sing, is itself an occurrence of no ordinary political importance, has been accompanied with circumstances of so peculiar a nature, as to demand special notice. It appears that, notwithstanding his life had been one continued violation of all the rules of Hindoo orthodoxy, he was determined to smooth his passage to the tomb, and to die, if possible, in the odour of sanctity, by expiatory gifts. Finding his end rapidly approaching, like another Italian conqueror, Mahomed of Ghizni, he ordered his treasures to be brought forward that he might feast his eyes with them for the last time. Then commenced a series of gifts to brahmins and shrines, the like of which has not been seen since the Golden Age. Estates of large value were lavished on the priesthood; a hundred cows, with gilded horns; a hundred caparisoned horses, equipped in gold and jewelled saddles; four elephants, with gold and silver seats; a golden chair and bedstead; plate; strings of pearls; swords; shields and other articles of incalculable value, were ordered to be sent to the shrines throughout India, to procure the piety of the Rajahs. Then the Sargolshah and the string of pearls which the Governor General had given him were made over to Madhoooodan Pamlit, because they were so very precious. And at last the dying penitent called for the mountain of light, the Koh-i-Noor, the unrivalled jewel which he had stolen from Shah Sujah, and ordered it to be sent to Jagannath; but here his son, his minister, and his attendant interposed, and represented to him how invaluable was the diamond, worth all the revenues of all India, and how difficult it would be for the brahmins to obtain a purchaser for it; and it appears that his consent was given to its being retained in the royal treasury. It must have been a scene worthy of the first pencil in Europe, this closing scene of Runjeet the Lion of the North, lying on his bed in the agonies of death; the physicians momentarily feeling his pulse, while he lavished away lands, gold, jewels and gifts, estimated at the most moderate computation, at a million sterling. The wind is involuntary carried back to the dying scenes in some castle of some daring, but penitent baron, in our native land, before the statue of Mortmain was passed.

Yet if this scene was painfully interesting, that which followed the death of the Rajah, was still more to be lamented. As soon as his departure was known, the Ranees raised cries and lamentations, tearing their hair, casting earth on their heads, throwing themselves on the ground, and striking their heads against bricks and stones. The bier of sandal wood was prepared and embroidered with gold flowers, and Rajah Dheera Singh declared his resolution to follow his master. The officers of state threw themselves at his feet, and entreated him to alter his resolution, as without him the affairs of the country would be entirely damaged. His determination was, at length, changed. Then came four of the Ranees to the bier weeping, and resolved to burn themselves with it. Kurruck Sing, the successor of Runjeet, did all in his power to dissuade them, but in vain. And, accordingly, four of his queens, and seven of his concubines, were consumed to ashes on the funeral pile. This is a circumstance most deeply to be lamented; but the revelation on the part of the women appears to have been so unexpected, as to have precluded all previous precautionary measures. Neither does any individual appear to have been present at his obsequies, to represent the Governor General. We are certain that his Lordship would have left no stone unturned to have averted so dreadful a catastrophe.

DEATH OF DR. BRENNAN.—We notice with feelings of deep regret the unexpected death of Dr. Brennan, Editor of the Bombay Times, at the early age of thirty-six. After having penned an article with his accustomed vigour, he was suddenly attacked with apoplexy, and sunk into a premature grave. His career in India has been short, but brilliant. In no instance do we remember to have seen a journal rise so rapidly into deserved celebrity, as that of which he undertook the editorial management. Without disparaging the merits of any of our contemporaries, we may candidly affirm, that it possessed few rivals, and no superior in India. His style was nervous, clear and chaste; his remarks, lucid, and often profound; and his editorial demeanour invariably courteous and gentlemanly. He brought to his task a high scale of qualifications, and a large acquaintance with men and things. His merits were already acknowledged through India, and they were beginning to be appreciated in Europe; and his loss will be felt far beyond the limits of the Presidency which enjoyed the benefit of his labours.

THE SOCIETIES.—A Correspondent of the Calcutta Christian Advocate, who deems a Society's badge an honour, has taken us to task for the freedom we have taken with the Society system. He finds fault with our "offensive" expressions. Now we particularly wish not to give offence. We have, therefore, avoided all accusations of any particular Society, or individual director or office-bearer belonging to them. But in speaking of the system we have used, and shall use, all the plainness and severity that consist in our judgement with truth. It may help our reprover, (for whom we entertain the highest respect,) and others also, to judge a little more correctly of our propriety of expression, if we give them a sample of the language used by others. A few months ago the following sweet sentences appeared in the Leicestershire Mercury.

"From first to last the Dissenters have been ruined by 'London Committees'. Half-hearted in their attachment to principles, truckling in their policy, arrogant towards their too-confiding country friends, meanly subservient to the Ministry of the day, greedy of funds, and profuse in their distribution of them amongst their necessitous functionaries, suppose when they ought to be active, forward and overbearing when they ought to be quiet, these 'London Committees' have ever been the loose and sandy waste, over which the full tide of Dissenting energy and zeal has had to flow down from all quarters upon the Legislature, and by which it has been absorbed before it could reach its destination. Never will any thing be effected worthy of an effort until we are thoroughly emancipated from the bondage of these London Committees."

The particular occasion for the use of such language is of no consequence. It is intended to give a description of the Society Committees, generally applicable to them all. We do not undertake to defend the language. We would only observe that it was attributed to Mr. Murrell, the successor of Robert Hall; and though he has disclaimed being the writer of it, he has not disavowed the opinion it expresses; whilst the ascription of it to him shews that the London people are aware they enjoy the censure of such men. And most assuredly they do. Go where you will throughout Great Britain, and you will find these sentiments—and find them clothed in language equally severe. The various religious publications have each their badge, like our worthy friend; and such expressions are not to be found in them. The feeling is, however, becoming all the deeper, because it is not allowed expression; and by and bye it will break out in other, and, we hope, holier and happier manifestations than those of bitter speech.

We are likewise blamed for unjustifiable insinuations, and especial offence is taken with the expression, "the great concern comes to be, to get money—honestly and religiously if possible—but at any rate to get money." Now we do not finish from maintaining the propriety of that expression, and its general applicability to our Societies. We consider money to be got dishonestly, which is got by exaggerated representations: it is a sort of swindling easily fallen into. And we consider money to be got irreligiously, which is got by stimulating irreligious passions. Whether our Societies do, or do not, resort to such means for replenishing their coffers, we leave to our readers to decide for themselves.

Our admonisher, before concluding his letter, forgets his own conviction of the impropriety of passing judgement upon what is only in part before him. If he will have patience, perhaps he may yet be satisfied we are no enemies to the Societies. In the meantime he may see we are not indifferent to the good they are effecting, by the pains we take to record the results of their operations as brought out at the Annual Meetings. We now subjoin a few more notices of these festivals, and have still another selection in reserve for next week. When they are disposed of, we hope to resume the discussions which have afforded so little satisfaction to the Society's Clippings; we adopt this term only because it is a more convenient expression than the two-line signature he has himself adopted, and may, therefore, be recommended to him, we hope, without offence, for future use, when he again favours us with his notice.

The Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Union was held in Exeter Hall, on the 2d of May, Mr. Sheriff Wood in the Chair. In opening the business of the meeting, the Chairman declared himself to have been long a Sunday-school Teacher; and spoke with much feeling of the happiness, and advantages of such a Union as was then celebrated. The Report was read by Mr. Watson. It began with the foreign operations of the Society, and stated that the most gratifying accounts had been received from the West India. An impetus had been given by freedom to the minds of the Negroes, and the demand for books, for schools affording religious instruction, had been beyond all precedent. At home 16 grants had been made in aid of the expense of erecting school-rooms, making the total number of grants 152, amounting to £2,340. The number of Sunday-school lending libraries granted this year had been 106, making a total of 471. The sales at the depository during the past year amounted to £3,014-12-7½. The receipts of the Society were £2,018-3-2; and the expenditure was £1,919-10-4: a balance, therefore, remained of £908-12-10; of which, however, £302 were devoted to the payment of the grants voted during the year for building schools. The reception of the Report was moved and seconded by the Rev. H. Townley, formerly of Calcutta, and the Rev. C. H. Roe, Secretary of the Baptist Home Missionary Society, in animated speeches of a truly Christian spirit. They were followed by the Rev. F. Martin, of Bourdeaux, who stated that great number of Sabbath-schools had been established in France. From 200 to 300 children attended the school in his own chapel. In Paris there were two churches composed principally of persons converted from the Romish faith, and nearly 900 children attended the Sabbath-schools belonging to them. The Rev. James Mirams, late Missionary in Berlin succeeded, and gave much interesting information respecting the progress of Sabbath-school instruction a-amongst the negroes of that colony, for which, however, we have no space. The Rev. W. Brock delivered a very effective speech, on the advantages of Sabbath-schools, in the course of which he remarked, they had heard of the late President of the United States being the teacher of a Sabbath-school. He could tell the meeting of a gentleman who occupied in this country, a position of great eminence, who, when at home, was a regular, conscientious, and most successful Sabbath-school teacher. He referred to the Bishop of Norwich. Every Sabbath, when at home, unless engaged in official duties which prevented him, he might be regularly seen wending his way, with his daughter, to instruct a Sabbath-school connected at the workhouse. The other speakers were the Rev. Robert Eckert, Mr. D. Nasmyth, (who stated that the President of the Church Missionary Society was a Sabbath-school teacher, and regularly employed with his class every Sabbath-day), the Rev. T. Williams, and W. B. Gurney, Esq.

The Annual Meeting of the Religious Tract Society was held in Exeter Hall, on Friday evening, the 6th May, Samuel Hoare, Esq., the treasurer, in the Chair. The chairman observed that God had vouchsafed His blessing on the labours of the Society during the past year beyond all former precedent: and it had already been the case of circulating two hundred and eighty-eight millions of publications, all of which contain the leading truths of the Gospel.

Mr. William Jones, the travelling Secretary, read an abstract of the Report. It referred to the operations of the Society in Japan, China, Peking, Singapore, Java, Borneo, India, Australia, Africa, America, the West Indies, and various countries in Europe. In the West Indies, increasing education has created a great demand for the publications of the Society: 120,000 tracts and children's books, and several libraries, have been granted to the ministers of all denominations in the islands; and consignments of books have at the same time been made to the extent of £510. In Canada the publications of the Society have been particularly useful in helping to relieve the spiritual destitution of the scattered population, without access to the ordinary means of grace; and in Russia, more than one Russian Prince has called at the tract depot, and selected tracts for circulation among their peasants. A reduction of one-sixth of the price of the Society's tracts had led to an increase of 1,354,569 in the sales at home during the past year. The publications circulated in the year were 1,523,389. The total income was £24,210-7-3; of which £20,447-1-4 was the amount of sales. The adoption of the Report was moved by the Rev. E. B. Edwards, who though he has latterly written in earnest support of some of the most questionable claims of the episcopalian polity, expressed himself in a most Christian and Protestant-like fashion.

"When he looked at the many emblems combined against them, oh! how important that those who held so many principles in common as Churchmen and Dissenters should not only be united together in spirit, but manifest their union as much and as openly as possible. They agreed together in the supremacy of the word of God, as a light pure and full as the sun in the firmament, without any human traditions—they agreed in the truths developed in that Word—in the harmony of the confessions of Protestant faith—they agreed that in the Saviour, Jesus Christ, dwelt all good things—that their own efforts could not in themselves do any thing—they agreed that the crown of glory belonged not to any of them, however perfect they might think their respective institutions, but that the crown of glory belonged to their Divine Emmanuel, the King of Kings and Lord of Lords. The enemies they had unitedly to oppose were popery, infidelity, and secularity; and the Tract Society was admirably adapted for opposition to them all. The motion was seconded by the Rev. F. Latrobe, Secretary of the Moravian Mission, who, referring to the recent emigration of converts from the Romish Church from the Tyrol, stated their conversion had resulted from the simple reading of the Scriptures, and one of those most excellent Protestant confessions to which the Report had referred. He had received a letter but a few days ago from one of those people, which afforded a satisfactory refutation of the charge lately brought by the Quarterly Review, against the King of Prussia, of having first induced these converts to leave their own country, and then forsaken them. Sir C. E. Smith moved the next Resolution, which referred to the importance of grants to our colonies. After arguing in support of the resolution, he claimed for the Society to have its publications entitled as the "Tracts for the Times," as more deserving of it than those which had been so designated. He had met a few days ago, a clergyman from the north of Ireland, connected with the Irish Society, of whom he inquired whether the Oxford doctrines had yet penetrated into that country. With characteristic readiness, he replied, "No, they have not come to us; we have the genuine old Oxford divinity—we have Popery itself." When it was propounded as justifiable, that religious instruction was to be a matter of reservation—to substitute sacramental efficiency for the only means of salvation through the Lord Jesus Christ—when doctrines like these were put forward, he trembled, especially when he considered that they had the stamp of national approbation, in so far as those who assent them were supposed to have a certain amount of ecclesiastical sanction. It appeared to him that those doctrines were the most formidable phenomena of the present times. The Rev. J. J. Freeman, late Missionary in Madagascar, seconded the resolution. He entertained the meeting with a story of the alarm created in Madagascar by the Missionaries introducing the word Society; the idea itself was novel in a country where despotism prevented all combination; and the new sound corresponded with two native words, soampely, which signifies "send it over here," the conclusion, therefore, was, that a Society was founded for bringing over English frigates to make a colony of the island. He had anticipated that he should have been able to prevent that platform one of the refugees from Madagascar about to visit this country, "the asylum of the ruled, the home of the free." Persecution still reigns there. He read a letter from a native of Madagascar, who had been educated in the Borough Road School, in which he expressed the opinion that in this instance, as in every other where pure religion had been persecuted, it would ultimately be diffused the wider. The refugee to whom he had alluded was the woman, who was supposed some time ago to have been martyred, but in lieu of whom another woman of the same name had suffered death. She was on her way to England. War was raging in one part of the island; and several chiefs had written to the British Government, entreating it to take them under its protection, and to preserve them from the violence of that Queen which Britain had partially assisted in placing on the throne, and promising if their request was complied with, they would afford every facility to the Missionaries, and proclaim toleration throughout the island. Our Government had thought it beyond their range, to do more than send a remonstrance to the Government of Madagascar. The Rev. Dr. Patten, of New York, succeeded, and entertained the meeting with inimitable wit, not uncheerful, however, with sterling piety. The Tract Society, throughout the United States, was going on with increased power; and one word of congratulation to the Pope! In the United States they were receiving a great many Epistols; they were coming over, in fact, in ship loads, and he could assure the meeting they were very glad to receive them; and why? for three reasons. First; it saved the Americans all the expense of sending Missionaries to them; it was the cheapest way of doing the work. Another reason was, that when they came there, the Americans were able to fight the battle of Protestantism against Popery on an open field, and under a clear sky; and there they stood without the arm of evil power stretched over either of them: there they might see naked truth grappling with error, wrestling, tussling hand at it, to see who should conquer. And, thirdly, it bothered the Pope most provisionally to know how to go along. The Rev. F. Orr seconded the Resolution, and observed that the Bible Society had determined to withdraw their agent from China, and the Church Missionary Society had been unable to send a Missionary farther than Singapore; but the truths of the Society were read with the greatest avidity by the Chinese, and found admission, though the Missionary was excluded. The Rev. W. Brock spoke powerfully against the Oxford doctrines. Mr. Jones, the Secretary, stated that the Socialists had taken to the article of widely circulating their own pamphlets in the wrappers of the Tract Society. The Rev. Dr. Stuart, of Dublin, testified to the amazing progress of education and inquiry in Ireland. The Rev. M. Martin, of Bourdeaux, assured the meeting that it was by reading a tract that he himself had been led to abandon the errors of Socinianism for the truths of vital Christianity. A few other speakers introduced the ordinary notions of course.

The 23rd Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, was held at Easter Hall, on Monday, the 6th May, Lord Morpeth in the chair. His Lordship introduced the business of the day, with an eloquent defence of the principles and practice of the Society. He could well conceive that an Established Church, in any country, might very becomingly stipulate, that the formularies or articles she adopted and admired should be used, in schools set apart for the children of her own communion. He most cordially assented to what he believed he might designate as the leading article of their own system—the free and unrestricted use of the entire Bible. At the same time, in the position which he had the honour to occupy in a country very differently circumstanced from this, he felt himself warranted, nay, called upon, to afford the most hearty encouragement to a system in which an equally free and unrestricted use of the Scriptures could not be conceived. His rule and motto upon that point always was, to give the whole Bible wherever they could, and as much as they could of it every where. The Secretary, Mr. Dunn, read the Report, which began by noticing the death of Joseph Lancaster, the founder of the Society's system. The Report of last year had stated that 42 teachers were in training; since then 183 had been admitted; of whom, 82 had been appointed to boys' schools, and 51 to girls' schools, 24 had been agents of Missionary Societies, 32 had either withdrawn from ill health, or proved unsuitable, and 42 were now in training. Upwards of 30 new schools had been opened during the year. Grants of school materials and other assistance had been made to 32 schools. The sixth Parliamentary Grant towards the erection of school offices was allotted in October last, when applications from 34 places for British Schools were admitted. The total number of children thus provided for would be 9,680; and the amount granted by the treasury was £3,315. Memorials from 22 other places for 47 additional schools remained undisposed of. The Report then detailed the foreign operations of the Society, and dwelt particularly on the pressing demands which the Committee were continually receiving from the West Indies. The reception of the Report was moved and seconded by Lord Howick and Sir George Grey. William Allen, the venerable and benevolent treasurer of the Society, then presented his accounts. The income of the Society had been £5,248-13, and the expenditure £3,205-10-6. The Report had alluded to the earnest desire manifested by the negroes in the West Indies for instruction, and some gentlemen had thought it might be possible to raise £10,000, in order to bestow on them that blessing; and he was happy to say they succeeded in raising £11,000. On the present occasion it was proposed to raise £15,000 for promoting the objects of the Society; and several gentlemen had put down their names for £100, provided the sum of £10,000 were raised. The second resolution was moved by the Bishop of Norwich, in a speech of great power, and replete with the noblest sentiment. We shall endeavour to give it entire next week; for it exhibits a model of consistency in the particularities of a particular religious denomination, combined with enlightened charity towards all men, which is most worthy of regard. It also affords important information of the state of parties at home. The Rev. G. Clayton, Edward Baines, Esq. M. P., Sir H. Verney, M. P., the Rev. J. Burnett, the Rev. R. Aldis, W. Evans, Esq. M. P., J. Rundle, Esq. M. P., Sir C. E. Smith, who took the chair when Lord Morpeth was obliged to withdraw, the Rev. F. Martin, and Luke Howard, Esq. were the other speakers. The speeches of Mr. Clayton and Mr. Burnett were particularly excellent.

On Wednesday, the 2d or 8th of May, we cannot determine which, the Annual Meeting of the Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor, in the principles of the Established Church, was held in the Central School-room, banqueting, Westminster, the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The Bishops of London, Norwich, Chichester, Bangor, Llandaff, Durham, Ripon, Salisbury, Chester and Hereford, with several other Dignitaries of the Church were present. The Rev. Mr. Wigram, the Secretary, read the Report. It appeared by the last triennial report, that there were 6,728 schools established on the principles of the National Society, which afforded education to 397,000 children. In aid of these schools Parliament had for some time granted £20,000 annually; and within the last eight years the Lords of the Treasury had set aside £24,000 for a similar purpose. Of schools established upon the principles of the National Society, including those independent of it, as well as those in connexion with it, there were 17,300, which gave education to 1,008,000 children. Out of £20,115, set aside last year by the Lords of the Treasury, for purposes of education, £15,000, had been appropriated to cases recommended by the Society. At one time the Committee had expected great assistance from the Lords of the Treasury, but those hopes were considerably reduced, in consequence of the recent publication of a parliamentary document, which shewed that the Society must place its sole reliance on the benevolence of the public. The Queen's letter had been received £24,800. The Committee propose erecting a training school for the instruction of 50 male, and 50 female teachers; which it would take £20,000 to erect, and £20,000 annually to support. For this object they had applied to the Privy Council for assistance, and the matter was still under consideration. The speakers at the meeting were Sir W. Farquhar, the Rev. Samuel Wilberforce, the Hon. and Rev. Lord John Thynne, and the Rev. Sir H. Duckfield. One of the Resolutions adopted was, "That existing circumstances call for increased efforts for the promotion of national education in the principles of the Established Church; and that a public meeting for this object be convened, at which his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury be requested to preside." His Grace, of course, expressed his readiness to preside at the proposed meeting.

REPORT OF THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION FOR 1837.—The date of this Report is almost enough to make one indifferent to its contents. It is impossible to guess for what reason, a Report of a few Schools for 1837, should not be submitted to Government till the 30th December, 1838, or, its publication having been sanctioned on the 27th February, 1839, it should not have come from the press till July. We trust that no similar delay will occur in reference to subsequent Reports; if it should, the public will naturally lose all interest in the labours of the Committee.

Yet the Report is valuable, and deserves respectful attention. It shows in the Members of the Education Committee a very deep interest in the objects of their charge. Their painstaking examination of the Seminaries immediately under their eye, reflects upon them the highest credit. It shews both their benevolent disposition, and their anxiety to accomplish a conscientious fulfilment of their duty. Nevertheless one cannot help wishing, that, instead of this occasional high pressure influence of laborious examinations on the course of instruction, there were a uniform tension secured, by the devoted superintendence of a public functionary, who, all the year round, should have nothing else to occupy his attention. On the present system, too much time seems to be lost, in ascertaining that the time of the students is well spent.

The Report is made up of distinct statements respecting each of the Seminaries under the care of the Committee; and these are of great importance. But a very acceptable service has been performed, by the collection of the general facts into three tables of Educational Statistics, which place the whole extent of Public Education, by state, patronage, at once under view. These tables we here transcribe as a record of much value.

In reviewing the whole, the Committee are constrained to say, "We do not disguise to ourselves, that in some places, particularly in Western India, our system of education has not yet attained the popularity, which it enjoys in the Bengal provinces, in which we are unable to meet the demand for new schools." This is a very gentle acknowledgment of a fact which would admit of much stronger expression. The system of the Committee has distinctly proved a failure, not "in some places," but nearly throughout the Western Provinces. Of this any one may be satisfied by a glance at the table of Anglo-vernacular schools; which are the only schools that find favour in the eyes of the Committee. Observe how paltry are the numbers in attendance in all the sixteen or seventeen Seminaries in the Western Provinces. Exceptions may be made in favour of Benares, Agra, and Saugor, and no more. And even these insignificant numbers are, in not a few cases, diminishing. If we turn from the tables to the Reports, we find it reported from Ghazepore, for instance, that "the education offered at the school still continued to be little appreciated by the inhabitants;" a similar feeling, aggravated by religious prejudice against European geography, appears at Azimgur; at Allahabad no field is the attendance, that the Head-master, in despair, wishes to exact engagements from the parents of the pupils; we know that the same thing is felt at Bareilly, and so we might say of nearly all the schools on this part of the list.

This is not the sort of fact which we should have expected would lead the Committee to say, "we are confirmed in the expediency, of conducting our operations on the principles, on which we have acted for the last three years, with the sanction of Government." They are determined to adhere to their principles; and what, then, is to be done, where the education afforded on those principles is not valued or accepted? "We shall not hesitate," say the Committee, "to transfer the appropriations made in favour of those places to other spots, where the boon which we offer may be more appreciated." This is cool; considering the extent of country over which the indifference complained of exists. It is very right to send back unqualified students to six or twelve months farther study; but it is another thing to send back, sine die, some thirty or forty millions of people—our people—to unrelieved ignorance and barbarism. Have the Committee any right thus summarily to deal with the national interests?

The Committee turn with comfort and complacency to Bengal; although even here every thing is not rose-coloured. Here, however, they rejoice they can have schools and scholars more than their funds will admit. Be it so: how came Bengal to present so favourable a field for their operations? Much of the preparation of its inhabitants, is owing to proximity to the seat of Government, and the centre of European commerce; but quite as much is due to the previous enjoyment of much vernacular instruction in European knowledge. Let the Committee keep in mind their triumphs in Hooghly, and the popularity of their school in Dacca. In both these places, especially the latter, there was no such influence of situation as in Calcutta and its suburbs. But no two places, to which the Education Committee have extended their operations, had been favoured like these with vernacular European schools: which had, by twenty years' culture, cleared away all prejudices, and imparted both the desire and the capacity for receiving any education the Committee might think of bestowing. Now if the ultimatum of the Committee be the universal prevalence of their system of education in English throughout India, let them adopt vernacular schools at least as a preparatory agency, where their English system is yet unacceptable. They would find that if they condescended to incorporate with the elements of education, indispensable to those who are to engage in Native business, a moderate portion of European knowledge in the vernacular speech, there is not a town in the country in which they would have to complain of insensibility to the value of the boon they offered. They might have 500 scholars educated by such means, at the same expense as the 50 of some of the English Schools are now taught at. When such a body of youth had been under instruction for a few years, an English School might be opened with the greatest advantage: and if the Committee had the heart to do so, they might then shut up the vernacular schools. We have received a long and able letter to the Committee from the Western Provinces, on the failure of their system there, which we shall lay before them in portions from week to week; and at the same time we shall have repeated opportunities for expressing our own views. We shall, therefore, say no more on the matter now.

There is added to the Report a very interesting Appendix relating to the Medical College. It contains the Report of the searching examination of the Senior Students in November, 1838, by Messrs. Nicolson, Grant, Martin and Stewart, on which certificates were granted to Umachurn Dey, Dwarkanath Goopya, Raj Krishna Dey, and Nubinchunder Mittra; a Report of the General Committee on the Institution generally; and the determination of Government in respect of the recommendation of that Report. It is well known that appointments have been given to the students who have so nobly distinguished themselves, of a new and liberal kind. The Governor in Council has also cordially approved of the recommendation, that vernacular medical schools should be instituted for educating those who are to fill the lowest grades of Hospital and Dispensary practice; whilst the Medical College is reserved for practitioners of a higher order. But another proposition of the General Committee, and their medical advisers, that six or eight of the students of the College should go to England under the care of one of the Professors, study for two or three years, take diplomas, and receive appointments as Assistant Surgeons from the Court of Directors, has not met with similar favour: and we are glad it has not. The estimate of the cost of eight students spending three years in this way is £8,000; which would nearly double the total charge of the College, and give as much for eight pupils as for all the other 70. We cannot forget, too, that the truest stretch of Mr. Trevelyan's hopes or thoughts in respect of all that can be obtained for the farther education of the whole population of the Bengal and Agra Presidencies is only twice the sum that would be appropriated to these eight young gentlemen. But we should not insist on these considerations, if the proposition itself offered any prospect of important benefit. We can regard it as nothing better than an ad captandam sort of demonstration, of no intrinsic value at all. But as it is negatived, it is unnecessary to argue the matter.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JULY 18.

The Foreign Quarterly Review states, that the Iliad of Homer has lately been translated into Sanskrit. This is a palpable mistake; and it has arisen, we fancy, from the republication of Pope's Homer, at Mr. Rastoun's Press.—The Bombay papers announce the sudden death, by apoplexy, of Dr. Brennan, the able Editor of the Bombay Times.—The Enterprise Steamer towed the Water Witch fairly out to sea; and as the vessel enjoyed a favourable wind, it is reasonable to hope that the voyage to Aden will be performed within the stipulated period of forty days.—Intelligence has been received from the Army beyond the Indus. The troops were to move from Candahar, in progress to Ghizam and Cabul, on the 25th of June, with full provisions for one month. Provisions had become cheaper at Candahar; the harvest had been reaped, and the only difficulty experienced, arose from the want of mills to grind the corn.—His Honour the Deputy Governor having received official information of the death of Ranjeet Singh, minute guns, sixty in number, corresponding with the age of the deceased, were ordered to be fired on the 15th instant from the ramparts of Fort William.—The Harkers give us the gratifying intelligence that Capt. Denny, late of the Seringapatam, is coming out in a new ship, the Vicomte, fitted with a thirty horse engine, to assist her in calais.—A meeting has been held of the most respectable inhabitants at Baraset, a large town a few miles from Calcutta, when it was determined to establish an English Seminary, at the expense of the community.—It is rumoured that the six Annuitants of the Civil Service, for the present year, will be Mr. Pattle, Mr. W. Crocroft, Mr. T. G. Smith, Mr. M. H. Turnbull, Mr. W. Braddon and Mr. Curtis.—The latest accounts from beyond the Indus state, that the ex-soldiers have fled to Poonia, where they will exhibit a practical proof of the energy which the British Government has displayed. We think their presence there is likely to do much more good than if they had quietly retired on a pension to our territories.

FRIDAY, JULY 19.

A deputation has been sent from Joudhpore to Col. Sutherland, who solicited an interview with him; but this was peremptorily refused. Preparations are in progress for marching into the country at the close of the rains.—A long and very interesting correspondence has been published by the Saram Committee in the papers of this Presidency, which exhibits the active zeal and untiring perseverance with which Mr. Timothy Curtis pursues this great national object.—An Envoy has, it is said, come from Shah Kamran at Herat, to Mr. Macnaghten, which shows his staunch adherence to the British Government. Dost Mahomed is reported to have sent his family on to Balk, preparatory, doubtless, to his own flight, when our armies shall press on him.—The Agra Utkhar states, that a report has been received by the last Mail, of the Pincation of the Directors to augment the Bengal Medical Establishment by two Superintending Surgeons, twenty Surgeons, and fifty Assistants. The report is all most too good to be true.—The Madras Herald states it as a fact, that a gallant son of Mars, who has recently been raised to a companionship of the Bath, returns all letters in which the augmentation of C. B. is not visible.—The Petition from the Mauritius planters to the Court of Directors, for a repeal of the Orders in Council, is this day published in the papers. This is the second annually in the practice of petitioning. The Mauritius, a Crown Colony, petitions the Company to obtain the abrogation of the orders of the Crown; and the Opium merchants of Calcutta appeal to the Queen's Council for a favour they are anxious to obtain from the Company.—Part of a gang of dacoits, it is said, have been captured in Calcutta, upon the premises of a respectable Bahad. They are part of an organized gang which has long disturbed the peace of the districts around Calcutta.—The rains have, at length, set in at Agra, and in the surrounding provinces; and the prospects of want which had been so fearfully entertained have been, in a considerable degree, dispelled.

SATURDAY, JULY 20.

Accounts are given in the papers of a most atrocious robbery committed about six miles from Calcutta, by a gang of robbers, who went fully armed and prepared to resist the public authorities. They carried torques with them, kept off all assailants, murdered several men, and bore away in triumph the treasure. In the morning, however, fifteen of the number were seized.—The Mahamudra has overflowed her banks, and laid the surrounding country under water.—Mr. Watson, late of the Sailor's Home, and latterly Assistant to Mr. Wilson, has issued a plan for the establishment of a family Hotel at Korioung, which is the first hill stage on the Darjeeling road, four thousand feet above the level of the sea. During the month of June, the thermometer never rose higher than 70° at the very hottest season of the year. The building will contain twelve apartments, besides bathing rooms, and is conveniently divided into four compartments. It is said that it will be ready in February.

MONDAY, JULY 22.

The ARMY OF THE INDIA broke ground on the 13th of June, en route to Gilgit and Cabul. A portion of the army started on that day; a second portion was to move the next day, and the remainder on the 17th.—A Commission of Enquiry is now sitting on some Malles, who are said to have excited disaffection to the British Government at Hyderabad.—From several of the districts in Bengal, the accounts regarding the Indigo crop are very favourable; the other parts scarcely an average one.—Dr. Campbell, the Surgeon of the Residency at Cawnpore, is in orders to take the place of Col. Lloyd at Darjeeling.—Mrs. Leach, who has just returned from England, has taken the lower part of the house occupied by St. Andrew's Library, for a Theatre, to be called the Sans Souci. However little care there may be below, there must be quite enough of it above, unless Messrs. Thacker and Co. happen to be fully insured.—The last May Mail brought intelligence of the very favourable disposition of the Members of the Court of Directors to the Assam Tea Company, and it is not improbable that the determination of the local authorities, as in the case of the Bombay Bank, may be modified by the higher powers in Leadenhall Street.—Letters from Aracan state that the Burmese are stockading the frontier; and it is expected that their next care will be to stockade themselves on the Yamalanga Hills. Consequent with this intelligence, we are told in the Hurkara, that Lord Auckland and his suite will leave the Hills in October, and descend to the plains, and may be expected in Calcutta in February; and that His Lordship's trip to the metropolis has reference to a Burmese war.—The total number of Shares taken in the Suez Company up to the 11th July, was 1961, making a subscription of nearly 100,000*l.*; of which the first instalment, or one-tenth, has already been paid up.—The Soomra flat, in tow of the Thames Steamer, has just made the trip to and from Allahabad in twenty-eight days, the quickest on record.

TUESDAY, JULY 23.

Intelligence has been received of the safe arrival of the Steamer Kithway, at St. Vincent. She may, therefore, be hourly expected to arrive at Bombay.—The Englishman has transferred from the Chandrika, to its own columns, a pompous account of the reception of Rajah Greenghader, of Nuddea, by the Deputy Governor, from which we understand that he proceeded upon the visit with a rabble of a hundred men, with swords, spears, muskets, &c. &c.; that Capt. Dabwood received him at the steps, and Mr. Robertson rose on his entrance, placed him on a sofa, and when he went away gave him some poun and utter. The object of the Rajah is to get the Company's paw off the free tenures, which, after the battle of Pinnacy, his grandfather transferred, in free tenure, to his own family.—A most fatal instance of Cholera is stated to have occurred at Chinglopat. On the 24th June died Ellen Doherty, aged five; on the 25th, her sister, aged sixteen months; on the 30th, the father, and the next day, the mother, all within one week, of this fatal disease.—Letters from Quetta state, that Sir John Keane had received a sig from Government, for some of his measures, more especially for having marshalled so large a force into a country so destitute of all the necessities of life.—A Correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser states, that the soi-disant Portab Chand is actually going to England to prosecute his claims; and he hopes that Baboo Radia Kissen Mitter will continue to shed the cause of this poor unfortunate man, by advancing him money sufficient for "his requisite purposes."—From the same paper, we learn that a new office is likely to be established, in the Board of Revenue at this Presidency, that of Preparer of precedents.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 24.

If, M. Ship, the Volage, has been despatched to Canton, to aid the views and measures of the Superintendent.—A letter published in the Englishman this day, contains an account of a warrant, and to all appearance, an illegal outrage on the Press at Moorshedabad. On Friday last, the Printer was seized in mid-day, and locked up a close prisoner, denied the use of pen, ink and paper, without his or any one else's knowing the reason. On the 20th, the Printing Office was sealed up, and the number about to be issued, retained, with all the property. Such is the statement given. We must acknowledge that there is something, we do not say brutal, but impolitic, in such proceedings, that we suspect our belief till we hear both sides of the question. If there be any truth, however, in these statements, we pity—not the Printer, but the Magistrate, who, not having the deposition and banishment of Charles the X. before him, has put forth his hand to the press. He will never hear the last of it in India or in England. For his peace of mind and advancement in the service, we hope the whole may turn out to be fiction.—At a meeting held at the Town Hall of the undersubscribers to the Statue of the late Bishop Heber, present, five persons. The Bishop, the Chief Justice, the Archbishop, the Presidency Chaplain, and Mr. Robinson. It was resolved that as there was no suitable position in the present Cathedral for this colossal statue, it be placed in the Eastern veranda, until the new Cathedral is complete. The Bishop stated that all the funds were ready; that the edifice would be completed in two or three years; that it would be a Gothic building, 185 feet long, by 85, and 60 feet high, without galleries.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

RESOLUTION OF THE COURT OF SUDDER DEWANNY AND NISAMU ADALUT, UNDER DATES THE 5TH JULY, 1889.

Read the Resolution, of the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal, under date the 20th March last on the progress made in introducing the Vernacular Languages in the Proceedings in the Revenue and Judicial Departments.

1. The Court resolve, with the sanction of His Honour the Deputy Governor, that the Oordoo language shall in future be the language of record in all proceedings and orders in the Sudder Dewanny and Nisamut Adalut at the Presidency, and that the same shall be written in the Persian character.

2. The proceedings and papers in all civil cases transmitted of this Court, which may be written in the Persian, Oordoo, or Bengalee language, should be unaccompanied by translations; but in criminal trials referred to the Nisamut Adalut, with exception to trials for the crime of Thuggee, all papers which may not be drawn up in the Persian or Oordoo language, shall be accompanied by translations in the latter.

3. All papers in the Mag. Orissa, and other dialects, shall be accompanied by Oordoo translations.

4. The Officers of this Court shall be allowed a period of one year from this date to qualify themselves in the Oordoo and Bengalee languages.

5. The authorities of the districts in which the Oordoo language is current, shall be required to take measures for intro-during the use of the Nagree character in writing that language; and to report, on the 1st January next, the progress which has been made in that respect.

6. In the districts in which either the Oordoo or the Bengalee is the current language, parties are to be allowed, in all civil and criminal courts, to present all petitions and pleadings in any language they think most suitable for their purpose; but any documents so presented, which may not be written either in the Persian, Oordoo, or Bengalee, shall be accompanied by translations in one of these three languages. The same rule shall be applicable to Futwas and Bewustals required from the Law Officers.

The authorities in the Bengal districts shall correspond with each other in the vernacular language, and employ the Oordoo in their correspondence with the courts of other districts. The same rule shall be observed, mutatis mutandis, in Cuttack and the other Provinces subject to the jurisdiction of this Court.

8. The authorities of those districts in which the Amshah have not yet sufficiently qualified themselves in the vernacular languages, are authorised to grant them a reasonable time for acquiring proficiency in the same.—Cont. Adv.

DEATH OF RAJESH SINGH.

"The Maharajah later in the day became very ill, and at the time of departing from all his worldly wealth, ordered his treasures and jewels to be brought forth. 100 cows with horns gilded, 1000 spanned horses, and five of the best breed, such as the "Kubotrah," the "Kandahar," the "Nagveng," and others, all equipt in gold and jewelled saddles, 4 elephants with gold and silver boudes, a golden char and bedstead, plates, strings of pearls, awaria, shelds, guns, and innumerable other valuables were given in alms and deposited with Misor Bellee Run to be distributed in all parts of India, and at all the sacred Hindoo shrines and temples. Afterwards a Surpesh, received from the Governor General, and other jewels and gold bangles, were given away.

"The gifts made this day are computed to have amounted to about two crores of Rupees, but making allowances for exaggeration, it can be no less than one crore. The ministers and Koonwur Khurruk Singh enquired, with cries of lamentation, 'what would become of them?'—on which the Maharajah said that. The Rajahs (Dhian Singh and Meer Singh) will, according to their own opinions, distribute all the money and things to the Gourdwaras and other places, and to the Brahmins and Sudhies. The Maharajah sent for the precious diamond (Koh-i-noor) from Bellee Ram, and wanted to give it in alms; but he was dissuaded by the Rajahs, who represented how invaluable a diamond it was—worth the revenues of all India, and that there would be no one to buy it from the Brahmins. A Ja- per of 25,000 Rupees annual revenue was granted to the Am- rutsar Gourdwaras to support travellers. The Surpesh and string of pearls received from the Governor General were given to Pandit Mudoodun, because of their being so very precious. The gifts continued till evening, and the Maharajah remained in the state in which he was, the physicians all the while feeling his pulse. The Rajahs have so strictly guarded the Tombkhans, the Fort, and the City, that no stranger can enter, and similar arrangements have been made at Amrutsar through Misor Bhokraj. At Jemadar Khoshal Singh's suggestion, Koonwur Khurruk Singh has written to Koonwur Sheer Singh to come without, and he is expected to arrive as soon as possible.

"The death of the Maharajah being known, the Ranees Koon- wur Khurruk Singh, Rajah Dhian Singh, Jemadar Khoshal Singh, and others, ordered cries and lamentations, tearing their hair, casting earth on their heads, throwing themselves on the ground, and striking their heads against bricks and stones. This continued during the night by the side of the corpse; every now and then looking towards the corpse, their shrieks became shriller. The gates of the Fort were shut, but Koonwur Khurruk Singh ordered the shops in the city to be opened, and business to be carried on.

"Koonwur Khurruk Singh, Rajah Dhian Singh and others, had a tier of sandal wood prepared, and embroidered with gold borders. Rajah Dhian Singh prepared to burn himself with the Maharajah, but the Koonwur and the Sirdars threw their tur- bans at his feet to dissuade him, alleging that without him the affairs of the state would be deranged. It was not until after some hours passed in thus beseeching him that they could pre- vail upon him. Then the Rajah proposed to go to Benares af- ter a year, which was complied with. Ranees Loomdin, called "Guddun," daughter of Rajah Sumas Chind of Kishan, the Ranees Hindoor, daughter of Meer Fudlun Singh, of Noorpoor, Ranees Rajkour, daughter of Sirdar Jay Singh, of Chynpoor, a village about 7 miles from Amrutsar, and the Ranees "Baant Allee" came and approached the corpse weeping, and resolved to burn themselves with their husband. Koonwur Khurruk Singh did his utmost to dissuade them; he pointed out to them the dignity and the affluence they were possessed of, promised that in the future he would be with all his heart and soul most de- voted to them, would they only relinquish their intention, but they would not for a moment listen either to the appeals of the Koonwur or the other Chiefs—Ranees "Guddun" taking Rajah Dhian Singh by the hand, and placing it on the breast of the corpse made him swear never to be a traitor to Koonwur Khur- ruk Singh, and Now Nihal Singh; or to be inattentive to the welfare of the State. Koonwur Khurruk Singh was in like manner made to swear to be led away by no misrepresentations of interested parties to renounce Rajah Dhian Singh; and the torments due for the slaughter of a thousand souls were im- pressed on him who should violate his oath. The corpse was then washed by the Koonwur with the water of the Ganges and placed on the splendid bier. Rajahs Dhian, and Meer Singh, Khoshal Singh, Ajot Singh, Sumas Chind, the Vardas, the Ahwalas, of Ladah, of Telahra Haraur, Dose, and others, threw shawls on the bier, and it was carried in procession in the garden at Dhulkote, situated in the Fort, near the Huzoor, ad- joining to Gourdus Ujain's residence. The four Ranees, clad in the richest apparel and jewels worth many lakhs of Rupees, ac- companied the procession, bestowing every now and then some portion of their jewels and ornaments to the singers and the Brah- mins. Having arrived at the funeral pile made of sandal wood, the corpse was placed upon it. Ranees Loomdin sat down by its side, and placed the head of the deceased on her lap, while the other three Ranees with seven slave girls seated themselves a- round, with every mark of satisfaction on their countenances. At ten o'clock, nearly the time fixed by the Brahmins, Koon- wur Khurruk Singh set fire to the pile, and the Ranees of the Pan- jabs, with four Ranees and seven slave girls, were reduced to ashes. A small cloud appeared in the sky over the burning pile, and having shed a few drops, cleared away. No one saw a hope of relief but in resignation. Rajah Dhian Singh attempted four times to jump into the burning pile, but was withheld by the multitude. After the ceremony was over, Koonwur Khurruk Singh and the other Chiefs bathed themselves in the Ganges, and returned to the Huzoor Garden. Fifteen pairs of shawls and twenty dusters were given to the singers of the holy hymns of Baba Nanak; and a thousand rupees were distributed amongst the poor. The Koonwur sat lamenting. The heart is rent in at- tempting a description of the distress and lamentations in the Pa- lace, amongst the Ranees, and amongst citizens of every age, sex, and religion."—Delhi Gazette, July 10.

RELIGION.

THE OXFORD THEOLOGY.—The distinguishing feature of the Oxford Theology, however, is its political doctrine. It has been well said, that Popery is not only a religion, but a power; and the same holds good of the Oxford Catholicism. This fact is unequivocally recognised, and its consequences pointed out, by the eruditest Author of "Spiritual Popery," in his recent publication, entitled, "Ancient Christianity and the Doctrine of the Oxford Tracts."—"THE VENERABLE PRINCIPLE of the Tracts for the Times—the inalienable right of the Church to an uncontrolled internal government, and its inherent spiritual supremacy in relation to the civil power, generally, and to the temporary administration of that power in particular,—this weighty doctrine tends, directly, as all must see, to a disruption of the existing connexion between the Church and the State, or to a secession, a renouncing of the texture from the top to the bottom." This "centre principle" is avowed and defended by the Quarterly Reviewer, almost as bravely as by the British Critic. Now mark: were the Tories to regain political ascendancy, this centre principle would immediately become a principle of action, not, not now, in threatened resistance to the State, but in dangerous alliance with it. The Times, at present siding against the Papacy, recommends the Oxford disputants, "if they are the honest friends of Protestantism, to postpone their unprofitable janglings, at least for some years to come." This is prudent and significant counsel. It means: "Wait, gentle- men, till the alarm about Popery has blown over, and your friends are in power." The Times will then find no more difficulty in adopting a new creed in theology, than in politics. The policy of the Tories is, secretly to favour the spread of the Oxford opinions, but to keep things as quiet as possible, and to hush all controversy, all alarm. The idea that Religious Freedom can be in any danger from this quarter, is treated with ridicule. The reference is this cause for apprehension in the Address circulated by the Provisional Committee of the Religious Freedom Society, was treated by the Record as sheer affectation or hyperbole—an attempt to sound a false alarm. We are not alarmists. We are not unprepared for the impending encounter. But we entreat the friends to Religion, and to Religion's safeguard—Civil Liberty, not to be deceived—not to be betrayed into a false security. "The battle of the Reformation must be fought over again."—Pat.

THE DRAUGHT OF EXETER.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Rev. Thomas Grylle to the vacant demerit, and the chapter have not been pleased to accept him. This seals the condemnation of that venerable and honest body. First, They appointed a meeting, presuming that the Crown was ignorant of the impediment which the new law had placed in the way of the free exercise of its rights; they then intended to pounce upon this good thing, and appropriate it to themselves. Second, When the Crown smelt their plot, they embroiled the Queen in the free exercise of her right till Her Majesty was compelled to forego the appointment of the pious, exemplary, and self-denying Lord W. Russell, whose practical piety had been proved by his voluntarily giving up a large living of £,300. a year, and retaining a small one of 400l. only; and Third, They drove the Queen to nominate some member of their own body. And now, Fourth, The Queen having appointed a rev. member of their own body, they refuse to receive him. Here we not meet out a case against them? These are the men whose lives ought to be an example of devotion and loyalty to the Queen, and a pattern of obedience to all who look up to them. We understand that the Rev. Mr. Grylle is a very excellent preacher, an exemplary divine—but he supported Sir Hussey Vivian at the last Cornish election. Will this fact explain the new scruples that have arisen in the minds of the chapter? The Queen may be Queen, but the Church must be victory over her, or we shall never have peace.—Western Times

DR. CHALMERS ON CHRISTIAN UNION.—In a letter, dated November 10, to a Presbyterian minister in this country, (U.S.) who has kindly permitted us to copy it, the celebrated Dr. Chalmers of Edinburgh thus expresses himself:—"I am very sorry for the adverse circumstances of your Church, of which you take notice in your letter to me. We are not without difficulties and difficulties often I have been thinking much, of late, of the stress which our Saviour lays upon Christian unity, (John xvii.) I feel very certain, however, that the way to obtain this is, not by giving in to the worldly pretensions of any given Church claiming to be the alone true Church, but by evangelical Christians of all denominations laying greater stress on the principles in which they agree, and less on the points about which they differ. This union is to be brought about, not by the enforcement of authority on the part of an ecclesiastical corporation, but by the growth of light, largeness, and charity among all." Our readers will be pleased with the Catholic spirit of this paragraph. Dr. Chalmers has hit upon the true cure for contentions in the Church. John Howe prescribed the same remedy more than a century ago, and wrote much in its favour.—New York Observer, January 12.

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF SCOTLAND.—In the districts visited by the Commissioners of Religious Instruction, Scotland, there are reported to be, belonging to the Dissenting denominations, 766 places of worship, furnishing accommodation for 873,647 persons; and the actual attendance is estimated at 271,898. Of these 736 places, 290 belong to the Secession Church; 101 to other offshoots of the Presbyterian Communion; 93 to the Independents; 58 to the Baptists; 49 to the Methodists; 61 to Episcopians; 47 to Roman Catholics; and 61 to various minor sects. On comparing the lists of several of the principal denominations given in Oliver and Boyd's Almanack, with the congregations visited and included in the returns, there are found to be, in the districts unvisited, 101 Secession Churches, 20 of the Relief, 90 Presbyterian of other communions, and 17 Episcopalian; and adding for Independent, Baptist, and other denominations, 68, the total, in districts unvisited, will be 344. Assuming the average attendance in these churches to be the same as in the other churches of the same denominations, the results of the calculation will be as follows:—

	Congrega-	Minis-	Accommo-	Attend-
	tions.	ters.	dation.	ance.
Secession and Relief Churches, . . . . .	441	275	302,571	234,387
Other Presbyterian, . . . . .	111
Independent and Baptist, . . . . .	175
Methodist, . . . . .	60
Episcopalian, . . . . .	78			67,048
Roman Catholic, . . . . .	58
Other Sects, . . . . .	77
	1,000			369,544

Assuming the average attendance to be 44.44 per cent. of the population connected with the Dissenting denominations, the latter will amount to 881,700; which, out of a population of 2,500,000, is within a fraction of one-third, and confirms the Writer's previous estimate, founded on other data.

But can the remaining two-thirds be assigned with any good reason to the Established Church? Of the existing church accommodation, the Dissenters, though apparently only one-third of the population, have provided 453 per cent., and the Established Church 343. Within the districts visited, the total population of which is 1,778,928, the average attendance is—

In Established Churches, . . . . .	870,845
In other denominations, . . . . .	271,898
	631,748

Taking these numbers as representing the regular church-going population of the country, the result is, that 38,382 per cent. belong to the Establishment, and 47.18 per cent. to other denominations. Again; for a population of 1,778,928, the legal estimate of church-accommodation required is 790,534; while the actual provision is—

In the Established Churches, . . . . .	448,465
In other Denominations, . . . . .	374,647
	823,112

Exhibiting an excess of 32,558. But the attendance ought to be greater than the actual accommodation required, and, taken at one-half of the population, would be, . . . . . 880,941
Deducting the average attendance, . . . . . 631,748

we have a deficiency of . . . . . 137,757

That is to say, nearly a thirteenth part of the population would appear to stand at no place of worship. And yet, there is nothing generally unoccupied, in the various places of worship within the same districts, to the number of not less than 171,507. "This large amount of accommodation over and above the average occupation of it," the Writer remarks, "is another evidence that there is really no want of church-accommodation; and that, whatever may be the cause of the destitution of religious instruction, which exists, it is not to be ascribed to want of room in the churches." That the telling of seats does not operate as a restriction from the churches, is proved by the fact, that in the Secession and Relief Churches, for every 100 seats hit, about 117 are occupied, many regularly occupying seats without paying for them.—Pat.

CONGREGATIONAL UNION OF SCOTLAND.—From an abridgement in the Patriot of the 8th May, we learn that this Institution, during the past year, has added about sixty preachers of the Gospel in the Scottish Highlands and Islands, and various destitute parts of the Lowlands. Thirteen of these, (several of them wholly, and most of them principally supported from the funds of the Union,) preach in the Gaelic language; and, including their extensive tours last summer through almost the whole of the Highland districts and the Hebrides, made known the doctrines of salvation to about 50,000 of their countrymen—a people extremely destitute of the Gospel, many of them residing thirty miles from their parish church, and it being very far from the case that the Gospel is faithfully preached in every parish. Nineteen have been added, and some of them also entirely supported in the Northern Isles, by whose labours many thousands in these parts have heard the word of life. From £200 to £300 was expended last year on the Highlands and Islands alone. As the Union has fallen into debt by these efforts, and many most urgent calls are still made upon them for more preachers, they appeal for assistance to their more wealthy brethren in England.

THE CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT IN INDIA, in 1834, stood as under:—

Church of England.	Ch. of Scotland.	Ch. of Rome.
Calcutta, . . . . . 437,118 sicees rupees (37 clergy) 22,414 4,000
Bombay, . . . . . 306,502 (24 clergy) 20,685 5,922

		65,048 14,682

And we believe there are various grants and allowances not included in these amounts. Adding them to the above returns, we have the following results, taking the sicees rupees at 2s. sterling:—

Ch. of England.	Ch. of Scotland.	Ch. of Rome.	Other Den.

EDUCATION.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.—The annual distribution of prizes in the faculty of medicine in this Institution took place on Saturday, the 27th April, in the theatre of the College, in the presence of a crowded and respectable assemblage. The Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons was in the chair. Professor Cooper, Dean of the Faculty, read the Report for the session which had just concluded. The total number of students in the different classes was 476, being an increase on the preceding year. A great hall had been erected for the purpose of practical anatomy, which in space, light, and ventilation surpassed every establishment of the kind with which the Professor was acquainted. The Report also noticed the formation of classes of practical Chemistry, under the immediate superintendence of the Professors. Prizes were given in Surgery, Obstetric Medicine, Anatomy, Chreultery, Anatomy and Physiology, Pathological Anatomy, Materia Medica, Practice of Medicine, Botany, and Medical Jurisprudence. In each department the successful candidates were announced by the Professor of the class; and the Professors as they successively rose were loudly cheered. When the prizes had been distributed, the Chairman stated, that the annual increase of the College was far beyond its expenditure, and therefore is a considerable surplus applicable to the advancement of the objects most calculated to promote the best interests of useful and scientific education. There has also been added another wing to the hospital, containing 25 beds; an object of great and paramount importance to the medical students of the College, and highly beneficial to the afflicted poor.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE ECARBOLOIN, OR ARTIFICIAL HATCHING MACHINE.—Under this name a novel and curious exhibition has been opened at No. 121, Pall-mall, which is a machine for artificial incubation. Similar attempts have been made on a small scale in this country by Mr. May, and others; but these were merely scientific experiments, and their success depended upon the degree of attention which would be incombable with large numbers. The present machine is an oblong square wooden box, about nine feet in length and three in breadth, divided into eight compartments open to the light, in which the eggs are deposited, being spread prominently upon the floor. The heat is supplied by pipes, which can easily be regulated to the required temperature of 80 degrees, when, under favourable circumstances, the principle of which is the quality of the egg, the process of incubation goes on successfully—the chickens leaving from the egg at the usual period of twenty-one days. After ten or twelve hours they begin to feed, and are then removed into an apartment of a gradual temperature, to artificial farm-yard they give a very unusual appearance. The most part of the process of incubation that is visible is, of course, that of the chick leaving from the cell after its mature development; but scientific visitors may gratify their curiosity by breaking an egg at every successive stage. By the aid of a powerful light, likewise, the same interesting progress may be seen in the egg through the transparency of the shell. The exhibition itself is of a very interesting character, and likely to prove popular, as no where can the progressive development of animal life in its progress to maturity be so well shown or understood as in the facility afforded by this machine. The inventor is of opinion that this plan might be successfully introduced in an economical point of view, were an extensive establishment formed in a favourable locality, as the apparatus is susceptible of an interminable produce, and that in this instance the supply both of eggs and poultry would become so plentiful as not to be restricted to a luxury of life.—Pat.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF HORTICULTURE.—At the meeting on Tuesday evening, Mr. Glenny in the chair, Professor Johnson delivered a lecture on the leguminous plants, which he commenced by observing that from the earliest period of history or even tradition, the seeds of a tribe of plants known by the name of pulse had been used as food. They derive the term leguminous from the character of the seed vessel, vulgarly called a pod, but by botanists a legume; the individuals varying from a diminutive vegetable to a stately tree. Amongst other peculiarities, they are very susceptible to changes of temperature, and the incultation which is proper for the retraction of the stem is called the sleep of plants. The most extensive tribe is the papilionaceous, so named from the resemblance of its flowers to the figure of a butterfly. Many of the seeds, as the bean and pea, contain much more nutriment than grain, and a variety called lentils is still more nutritious; but the lupinum and other poisonous varieties of cydium belong to this class. Many of their productions are of great commercial importance both in medicine and the arts. From a pea plant (glycyrrhiza glabra) is obtained the impregnated juice called liquorice. Manna is the production of another species common to Persia and Tartary, and gum tragacanth is obtained from another called the milk vetch. Dragons' blood and kino, celebrated for their astringency and value in dyeing, are the product of others, as are also the red and yellow sanderswood. Gum lac is obtained from a species of utera; and indigo from several species of indigotera, and soy is the product of a species of dolichos—all of which are butterfly plants. Another extensive tribe of the leguminous plants is the mimosæ, including the sensitive plant of our hot-houses, and the acacias of our greenhouses and conservatories. Although the genera are small, the tribes are very numerous, as upwards of 400 varieties of acacias are known, and which, as a great many come from Australia, is likely to be considerably increased in number. One of their most important products is gum arabic, of which 450 tons are annually imported from the East Indies and the Levant. An extract from the bark, which is very astringent, is now, however, largely imported as a substitute for oak bark and other materials used in tanning.—Ind.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COPYRIGHT.—The following petition by the Author of the "History of the French Revolution" has been presented to the House of Commons:—

"To the Honourable the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, the Petition of Thomas Carlyle, a Writer of Books,

"Humbly sheweth,

"That your petitioner has written certain books, being invited thereto by various innocent or laudable considerations, chiefly by the thought that said books might in the end be found to be worth something.

"That your petitioner had not the happiness to receive from Mr. Thomas Tegg, or any publisher, republisher, printer, bookseller, book-buyer, or other the like man or body of men, any encouragement or countenance in writing of said books, or to discern any chance of receiving said; but wrote them by effort of his own and the favour of heaven.

"That all useful labour is worthy of recompence; that if honest labour is worthy of the chance of recompence; that in giving and assuring to each man what recompence his labour has actually merited may be said to be the business of all legislation, polity, government, and social arrangement whatsoever among men; a business inalienable in attempt, impossible in execution, difficult to accomplish without unscrupulous and become enormous, unapproachable, and the parent of social confusion which never altogether end.

"That your petitioner does not undertake to say what recompence in money this labour of his may deserve; whether it deserves any recompence in money, or whether money in any quantity could hire him to do the like.

"That this his labour has found no recompence, in money or material worth, small recompence or none; that he is by no means one of its ever-ready recompence, but thinks that, if so, it will be a distant time, when he, the labourer, will probably call for it in need of money, and find none clear to him still; by the time it comes, it will be too late.

"That the law does at best protect all persons in the production of their labour, and that they can get for it, in all the best places, to all lengths of time. Much more than this it does; to many, but so much it does to all, and less than this to none.

"That your petitioner cannot disavow himself to have done unlawfully in this his said labour of writing books, or to have become criminal, or have forfeited the law's protection thereon. Contrarywise your petitioner believes freely that he is innocent in said labour; that if he be found in the long run to have written a genuine enduring book, his merit therein, and use to the world of England and English and other men, will be considerable, not easily estimable in money; that, on the other hand, if his book prove false and ephemeral, he and it will be abolished and forgotten, and no harm done.

"That, in this manner, your petitioner plays no unfair game against the world; his stake being life itself, so to speak (for life itself is death by starvation), and the world's stake nothing at all, except the dice thrown; so that in any case the world cannot lose.

"That in the happy and long-doubtful event of the game going in his favour, your petitioner submits that the small winnings thereof do belong to him or his, and that no other mortal has justly either part or lot in them at all, nor, henceforth, or for ever.

"May it therefore please your Honourable House to protect him in said happy and long-doubtful event; and (by passing your Copy Right Bill) forbid all Thomas Teggs and other extraneous persons, entirely unconnected in this adventure of his, to steal from his small winnings, for a space, of sixty years at the shortest. After sixty years, unless your Honourable House provide otherwise, they may begin to steal.

"And your petitioner will ever pray.

"THOMAS CARLYLE."

PETITION OF MRS. W. S. LONDON.—"That your petitioner would represent to your Honourable House his strong persuasion that no property is so entirely, and purely, and religiously a man's own as that which comes to him immediately from God, without intervention or participation. It is the eternal gift of an Eternal Being, and to interfere in any way with its benefits and blessings appears to your petitioner unbecomingly and unjust.

"Your petitioner, therefore, humbly submits to your Honourable able House that no Legislature has a right to confine its advantages to a thousand, or ten thousand years, or to give them away to any person or persons whatsoever, to the detriment of an author's heirs, after any number of ages.

"And your petitioner offers the less reluctantly these observations to your Honourable House, since he himself proposes no advantages to his descendants from any of his literary works, all which he has consigned and left in perpetuity to the discretion of a learned friend."—Fat.

REAL POLICY.—The first report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire as to the best means of establishing an efficient constabulary force in the counties of England and Wales, has just been laid on the table of the House of Commons. It is very elaborate and minute, inquiring apparently with great care into the whole subject. We have not at present either time to examine the details, or space to insert any more than the chief recommendations of the Commissioners. They are as follows:—

I. That as a primary remedy for the evils set forth, a paid constabulary force should be trained, appointed, and organized on the principles and management recommended by the Legislature in the appointment of the new metropolitan police force.

II. That for this purpose an application to existing, under the looks and seals of a majority of the Justices assembled at any Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county, setting forth the poverty of persons and property, and the want of paid constables, the Commissioners of Police shall, with the approbation of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, direct a sufficient number of constables, and such officers as may, upon such recommendation as the said Commissioners shall make or direct, be by them deemed adequate for the due protection of life or property within the county.

III. The force shall be paid one-fourth from the Consolidated Fund, and three-fourths from the county-rates, as a part of the general expenses of the whole county.

IV. That the constables so appointed shall report their proceedings to the magistrates of the Quarter and Petty Sessions where they are stationed.

V. That the superintendents shall be subject to dismissal upon the representation of the Justices of the Peace in Quarter Sessions, and that the sergeants and constables shall be subject to dismissal upon the representation of the Justices of the Peace in Petty Sessions.

VI. That the Magistrates shall frame rules and regulations for the service of process, and attendance at Petty or Quarter Sessions of such force, which rules shall be submitted to the sanction of State, and if approved by him, shall be binding.

VII. That the Commissioners shall formulate and regulations for the general management of the police, which rules shall, on the approbation of the Secretary of State, be binding.—Fat.

THE WIMBOROUGH DUEL.—Our readers will remember that the witnesses to the Wimborough duel of last year, in which Mr. Wright lost his life, have severally been sentenced to a twelve-month's imprisonment in Chalford Jail. These persons, Messrs. Fong, Wehler, and Broughton, yesterday petitioned the magistrates of the Surrey Quarter Sessions to allow them certain indulgences—the principal of which were, that of having milk or breakfast instead of gruel, permission to read the daily papers, and a more unrestricted intercourse with their friends. The Court, after deliberating upon the petition, decided upon its rejection, being of opinion that the previous station in society which the prisoners held, offered no sufficient reason for an abatement of the punishment, or due to the crime of which they had been convicted.—Fat.

IMPORTANT TO THEOLOGICIANS.—If it shall, as we have seen and space, at intervals bestow a thought and a sentence upon the great discoveries of the new theological system.—Times.

ging, of Salford. It is quite impossible for any but those who pay great attention to the matter (and who have at the same time already access to the parties commissioned by the continental manufacturers and spinners to enter into engagements on their behalf,) to form the most idea of the extent to which this sort of emigration is now conducted. But our readers will be still more surprised, perhaps, to learn that even women and young girls who have been brought up as spinners and piecers, &c., are now also regularly going to the continent to be employed in cotton mills. When it is considered, too, that such parties can now reach Ostend, or even Ghent, in less time, and at as little expense, as it took but only twenty years ago to reach London, there is little to be wondered at that the labouring classes should thus endeavour to dispose of their only merchandise (labour) to the best advantage. If, too, it be considered that, even at the present time, when mechanics are in full employ in this district, the various continental agents here find no difficulty in thus obtaining men by the score, what, let it be asked, may reasonably be anticipated should employment become really scarce? Why, instead of scarce, thousands would at once seek their fortunes in a foreign land. The aristocracy of England may shut, or pretend to shut their eyes to the effects already produced, just as they list; but still it is impossible that any thing less, and in very short time, indeed, than competition of an serious nature will arise as to make it indispensable for our spinners and manufacturers either to discontinue their works, or greatly reduce the wages of their work people.—Manchester Times.

SAFETY OF THE SKARON.—Loch Rannoch, in Atholl, has this week been completely frozen over, for the third time this winter, a circumstance never before remembered to have happened so well.—Scotsman.

THE THREE GEMATELY PHYSICIANS.—The celebrated physician, Dinoulin, being surrounded at his last moments by several of the most distinguished doctors of Paris, who vied with each other in expressions of regret at his situation, "Gentlemen," said he, suddenly, "do not much regret me; I leave behind me three great physicians." On their pressing him to name them, each being sure his own name would be among the number, he briefly added, "Water, Exercise, and Diet," to the no small discomfiture of his disappointed hearers.—Fat.

TREATY BETWEEN HOLLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.—The Handbook of Amsterdam publishes the treaty of Commerce concluded on the 10th of January between Holland and the United States. Its substance is as follows:—Article 1. All goods, without reference to their origin, imported into one of the ports either of Holland or the United States, or exported from the ports of one of those countries for the other, in Dutch or American bottoms, shall not pay higher duties than those fixed in the case of their being an board a national vessel. If one of the two contracting parties grant premiums, restoration of duties, or other advantages for the importation or exportation in national vessels, the same advantages shall be granted if the importation or exportation takes place directly between the ports of the two countries in vessels of the other contracting party. 2. Dutch and American vessels are not to pay higher duties in the ports of either of the two states any tonnage, salvage, quarantine, or police dues, except those established for the national vessels. 3. Perfect equality is to be established between the consuls and vice-consuls of both countries, in regard to the exercise of their rights and privileges, and the protection and assistance usually given, especially in the case of deserters from the navy of both countries. 4. Each of the two countries engaged to consider as belonging to the other, vessels provided with passports, or sea letters, by the competent authorities. 5. In case of shipwrecks or disasters at sea, each of the two parties engages to afford to the merchandise or war vessels of the other, the same assistance as in the case of its own navy. 6. The treaty is to remain in force for ten years, and will continue to be executed till one of the two parties shall have made known to the other its intention to the contrary twelve months before hand. 7. The ratification of the treaty are to be exchanged before the expiration of six months, commencing from the date of the signature." The treaty, dated Washington, January 19, has already been ratified by the Dutch Government.—Fat.

SLAVERY IN THE MAURITIUS.—On the 29th April, in the House of Lords, Lord Brougham inquired, whether there would be any objection to produce a dispatch from Lord Glenelg to the government of the Mauritius. It had given the greatest satisfaction to all who took an interest in the emancipation of the Slaves there, to see the judicious and vigorous step taken by his noble friend, for he had given notice to the government of the Mauritius that if the council refuse of themselves to carry into effect the emancipation, he should do it for them without waiting for communications from the other side of the world. This had saved six months in the liberty of the slave in the Mauritius; but no news had come from thence that any thing had been done. In the Mauritius, at least, one slave in three was detained by an act of felony. The Marquis of Normanby said there would be no objection to produce the dispatch; and Lord Glenelg observed that there had not been time for answer to it to be received.

EMIGRATION OF MECHANICS.—We understand that in February last a band of nineteen mechanics left Manchester per railway for America. On Tuesday morning, at half-past eight, another band of fifteen, all mechanics, took their departure from Manchester for the same destination. From particular inquiries made respecting this latter deportation, it appears that they are all of them machine makers, and several of them from the eminent machine-making establishment of Messrs. Cocker and Illig-

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS TO HEATHEN AND MAHOMMEDAN QATHUS.—We are happy to learn that the view we have taken of this subject is now extensively adopted amongst those gentlemen of the Civil Service, who are employed in conducting the judicial business of the country. There is, therefore, a general and anxious desire, to know what Government intend to do in this case. In our humble opinion, they can do but one of two things—either abolish oaths altogether, and substitute solemn declarations, sanctioned by the existing penalties of perjury; or convert the declarations, now permitted to be substituted for oaths on Gunge-jai and the Koran, in the case of respectable persons, into oaths to be administered to all classes, the last clause of the declaration for Hinloos, respecting the killing of brahmins and cows, being omitted.

By either course effectual relief would be given to the consciences of all parties. Both judges and witnesses would be thankful for such a deliverance from the guilt and dishonour incurred under the present system; and credible testimony would be far more easily obtained in all cases. For our own part, we should much prefer the abolition of oaths altogether, by such a measure our administration would be freed from the evil of much profanation of the sacred name of God; and it seems not improbable, that general veracity would be greatly promoted, by connecting the disgrace and punishment of perjury with simple falsehood. It is a grievous but prevalent misconception, which cannot be too soon rectified, that untruth is all but innocent, until it has been aggravated by an impious appeal to the Deity for its truth. A notion of this kind takes away the sense of turpitude from all false speaking on ordinary occasions; and when falsehood without an oath has ceased to seem criminal, its criminality with one will not be much considered.

But if the entire abolition of oaths be thought a measure of mere reform, let us have oaths satisfactory to all parties, by taking away the invidious distinction now made amongst the witnesses who appear in the Courts. The ordinary rule is, that Hindoos are to swear on the Gunge-jai, and Mahomedans on the Koran; but exception is made in favour of respectable persons of both classes, for whom declarations are provided instead of oaths. There can be no doubt that the exception is founded on expediency and not on principle. The oaths are the detestation of all classes; and no man of character would submit to take them, if he could avoid it. But the poor, the dependants of the chief litigants in the Courts, can be brought into Court as witnesses, without much difficulty, whether they will or not; whilst the rich, or the respectable, are not to be so easily commanded. If we are to have their evidence, we must take it on their own terms; and their terms are, that they shall not be put to the disgrace of swearing according to the rules prescribed for others. The Hindoo, however worthy a man he may be in his own condition of life, if he must pass master as respectable, must submit, as he thinks, to bring condign misery upon himself and fourteen generations of his kindred, and to bear the public stigma of being unworthy of credit on his solemn declaration. The poor Mahomedan, in similar circumstances, may not incur the same superstitious misery; but he is equally disgraced in the public eye. And what good reason can be shown for such partiality in the Temple of Justice? In other countries it has not been usual to attribute the pre-eminence in virtue to the "respectable" in worldly circumstances. Its more congenial home has been sought amongst the cottages of the poor; and we are not inclined to consider India as in this respect differing from the rest of the world. Such knowledge as alleviates the moral character is about equally scarce in all classes; and oppression, in its demoralizing influence, affects with great equality those who exercise it, and those who endure it; but the indulgences of wealth are generally corrupting, whilst the straits of poverty are often salutary; and so the poor have, at least, one chance of integrity more than the rich. It is hard, therefore, to aggravate the miseries of their position, by affixing a brand of infamy upon them, as often as they may be dragged as witnesses into the Courts.

Government could never, of course, be so unwise, as to declare that the solemn affirmations, which, for near fifty years, it has prescribed for respectable Hinloos and Mahomedans, and on which a large proportion of the judicial decisions of half a century have been founded, are in themselves deficient in binding character, or in legality, or validity, in any way. But if they are valid and binding for one rank of men, they are for all. Let them, therefore, be extended to all. A simple declaration from Government that they may be so extended, would be hailed as a boon of inestimable value through the whole country. We would interest an early and generous attention to the subject. The functionaries of Government, who have risen to the upper grades of the service, may be able to take the thing coolly enough. They have no oaths to administer. Their principles and feelings receive no shock from being compelled to a daily or hourly participation in the revolting confessions and adorations of idolatry. But they should remember the trials of their fellow-servants, and use their influence to procure for them the relief they desire. We consider it highly honourable to the Civil Service, that the desire for this relief has spread so rapidly and extensively through its ranks as it has done; and we trust it will not long remain unheeded.

THE TRANSLATORSHIP.—We return to our hobby, as the Commercial Advertiser has designated the Translation of the Acts of this Government into the vernacular languages. The Calcutta Courier has pricked us on, by inserting the latter of a Correspondent last week, and adding some remarks of his own, relative to the proper mode of coming at a good Translator. There seems to be an impression abroad, that this important post is to be given away upon the ground of favour, rather than merit. It would be ungenerous to suspect the Authorities of so very improper a measure, and we must have very strong evidence before we can believe it. But an objection is taken to the mode which has been adopted of testing the qualifications of candidates. It is said that a certain regulation, or a portion of it, has been given to them to translate at home. If this be the case, we say at once, and without hesitation, that the test is totally inadequate; and that the failure will be complete. A translation made under such circumstances, can be no criterion of the fitness of the candidate. Of course, for such an occasion, he will press into his service the assistance of all his friends; but this assistance, though available for once, will not be within reach after the prize has been won. To form an accurate and idiomatic translation of the Acts of this Government, it is necessary to combine the double talent of a thorough acquaintance with the original, and an intuitive knowledge of the idiom of the vernacular tongue. These two talents cannot be found in the same person. The individual from whom an acquaintance with the original is expected, must also be sufficiently acquainted with the Native language, to be able to determine whether the original has been accurately rendered into it or not. The person to whom, — as to speak, — the Native department is consigned, must be thoroughly master of Saugakrit and Bengalee; of the rules of translation, and of the technical phraseology of the Acts. Such a person is already in the service of Government, in the person of the present Pandit, Kseub Nyeyeratanu, who was trained up by Dr. Carey to the translation of the Regulations, for nearly ten years, after he had served a long apprenticeship in the compilation of his great Bengalee Dictionary. We hope Government will, on no motives of piddling economy, be persuaded to part with his services. As he cannot, however, assist every candidate, we would venture to propose, as the safest mode of securing a fair field with no favour: 1st. That the salary of the Translator be fixed on a remunerating scale, so as to enable him to bestow the cream of his time on the public interests. 2dly. That he be required to translate all that Government may require, and that Government require of him all that the Native community require to know. 3dly. That the candidates be invited, by public advertisement, to a competition, each one being at liberty to bring his own Pandit with him. 4thly. That they be assembled on a given day in one or two rooms; that the doors be closed two hours; during which period they be required to render into Bengalee one page of the most difficult of the untranslated Acts; or rather, one page of the New Criminal Code, which usually passes under the name of the Macaulay Code.

THE MILITARY ORPHAN SOCIETY.—Dr. Corbyn has furnished the public, in the last number of his Indian Review, with a clear and comprehensive view of the present state of the Military Orphan Establishment. The facts which he has brought forward, relative to the Orphan Schools at Kidderpore, are so unexpected and startling, that they must lead, at no distant period, to an entire remodelling of the whole system. The authenticated accounts which have been published, exhibit, it is true, a trifling balance of receipts above the expenditure, but the Doctor is of opinion, that if certain items, which have been omitted, had been inserted, the balance sheet would have exhibited a different appearance. We are not sufficiently in the secret of the accounts to be able to decide between these conflicting statements. Doubtless, many of his readers are in the same predicament; but the extraordinary cost of education at Kidderpore, which he establishes by a reference to the published accounts, must be obvious to the most common observation. Of the wards of this valuable institution, it appears that an increasing number has annually been sent to England for education. At the present time, of 488 wards, male and female, borne on the strength of the Establishment, no fewer than 306 are in England; 81 residing with their friends, and the number actually boarded and educated at the Kidderpore Institution, has, consequently, dwindled down to 84, or one-sixth of the entire number. Thus, it appears, that a change has gradually come over the economy of the Establishment, which renders complete revision of it indispensable. In consequence of the reduced number of pupils in the male and female department, without any corresponding reduction in the strength of the Establishment, the expenses of boarding and educating each child amount to the incredible sum of 48 Rs. 12 annas a month! By far the 'largest' share of this sum arises from the expense of the Establishment, which is precisely the department which least admits of reduction. For, be the number of wards under tuition great or small, the Managers would scarcely be justified in sanctioning a lower scale of qualification in the teachers; and the present scale of remuneration does not, we apprehend, exceed the market price of the talent which has been engaged by them. The present establishment is, of course, equal to the instruction of double the number who benefit by it. It is the disjunction of scholars which gives so disproportionate an appearance to the expenditure; and it does seem preposterous to keep up so large an establishment for so small a minority of the wards. If five-sixths of the wards are in future to be educated in Europe, there can be no adequate reason for keeping up so costly a system for educating the remaining sixth in this country; and we cannot see that the advice given by the Indian Review and the Englishman, of folding up the Kidderpore Institution, and disposing of its premises, is opposed to the dictates of reason. It is the alteration of circumstances in the transfer of so large a number of wards to our native land, for a more rigorous education, which has brought on the necessity of this change of system. We are strongly reminded on this occasion of that splendid passage in Burke's speech on economical reform; and the reasonableness of the subject with which we have occasioned these remarks, may possibly recommend it to the especial notice of the Managers. "When the reason of old establishments is gone, it is absurd to preserve nothing but the burden of them. This is superstitiously to enshrine a carcass not worth an ounce of the gums that are used to preserve it. It is to burn precious oils in the tomb; it is to offer meat and drink to the dead—not so much an honour to the deceased, but a disgrace to the survivors."

CASANDRA'S LETTER.—We cannot allow Cassandra's able letter to appear without a brief comment. And, first, as to the weight of public business with which the higher functionaries are at present oppressed. We think he has scarcely taken into sufficient consideration the undue centralization of power which the New Charter has produced. It has reduced the Governors of the subordinate Presidencies to the rank of cyphers, and concentrated all authority, general as well as local, in the hands of the Governor General. In this respect its defect is becoming daily more and more visible, and is proclaimed in the unsoftened murmurs of the communities which have been deprived of all liberty of action. The object at which the provisions of the New Act aimed, were doubtless, laudable. It was intended to give a unity and a fixedness of character to the administration of this empire; but it has fatally shot beyond the mark, in depriving the minor authorities of all power, and fixing too unwieldily a responsibility upon a single chief. To have left adequate authority with the Governors of Presidencies for carrying forward the improvement of the country, would have been perfectly compatible with the concentration of political power in the hands of a political superintendent of its vast connections. While Cassandra laments the centralization of local functions in the chief authorities at each Presidency, we could wish him to treat us with his opinion of the system by which the functions which naturally belong to each division of the empire, have been absorbed, in one individual, or one distant Council. In the practical application of the Act, moreover, there has been a still wider departure from the principles of sound government, and even from the spirit in which, — defective as it is, — it was framed. There is no question that the legislators who assisted at its birth, intended that the Council of India should be composed of members from each Presidency, in order that local interests might be adequately represented in a body, which was vested with the supreme executive and legislative control of the country; for nothing short of this system of representation could be supposed to reconcile the subordinate committee to that deprivation of power and dignity, to which the Act has subjected them. Yet with the exception of Colonel Morrison, every nomination to Council has been made from the Bengal Service; and Madras and Bombay are deprived of a voice in the preparation of the orders by which they are to be governed.

Secondly; as to the erection of Municipalities, we are enabled to inform him that the Report of the Municipal Committee has now been laid before Government in print. It is a most interesting and valuable document; but vital, so voluminous, that what with the war beyond the Indus; what with the prospect of hostilities with Nepal and Burmah, and the awkward position of affairs in China, re-acting on the finances of Government here, we question whether there will be any leisure to digest it for a twelve month to come. Supposing the Report digested, and a new Municipal Act passed, we are not on our side of India the honest and vigorous agency—we mean the European agency,—by which its provisions could be beneficially brought into practice. To accustom the people to the due and beneficial working of municipal institutions, must, if we are to judge by the example of England, be the work of more than one century. Our own municipalities grew out of the courage of our yeomanry and burgesses, and were introduced primarily to resist the power, and to curb the insolence of an overbearing aristocracy, which trampled with equal impunity on the prerogatives of the crown, and the natural liberties of the people. We have here, in an equal degree, the oppression of the rich and powerful; we have a kind of aristocracy, without moral equity or virtue; but, unfortunately, our burgesses are without moral courage. It will, therefore, be necessary that these incipient bodies should be superintended by a moral agency equally strong and virtuous; and for this we must look mainly to the European functionaries of Government. But what time have they to superintend the introduction of principles of self-government; to watch their progress and to prevent the institutions, through which they are to be developed, from becoming new sources of oppression in the hands of the rich and great? If they were relieved from the oppression of existing burdens, and endowed with leisure to watch over the growth of new establishments, they are still too much hindered of passage to acquire that intimate knowledge of the intellectual materials, with which they must work, which alone can hold out any prospect of success. Nothing can be more desirable than municipal institutions in India; but to insure their growth and utility, and, in fact, the plantation of many other useful institutions, necessary to the progressive improvement of this country, the public services must be so remodelled, as to give us a larger share of European agency.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.—The Lady Grant has brought intelligence from Canton to Bombay to the 11th May, six days later than the advices of which we were in possession. The news is, if possible, more disastrous than that which was first brought of the capture of the Opium; and it is to be apprehended that our losses in China, through the extraordinary crisis which has arisen, will not terminate with the confiscation of that article. Though the Chinese profess the most tenacious fondness for old and established customs, they have passed a New Law to regulate the future intercourse of all foreigners in China. It appears that the British Superintendent, and the Dutch and American Consuls, as the Chinese Proclamation states, "had asked that, at the head of the people, and vessels of their several countries, they might altogether take their departure and return home." We surmise from the phraseology of the Edict, that this determination somewhat startled the Imperial Commissioners; and that the prospect of a total desertion of the port, and the interruption of its trade, and of the revenue which it yields to the Chinese Exchequer, was a result totally unexpected. After having declared that the Chinese stood in no need of commerce with outer Barbarians, he tells the foreigners that if they go away, they will never be allowed to return. This looks very much like an oriental figure of speech, signifying that the Commissioner is anxious they should stay.

How it is possible for them to remain in the present state of things, it is difficult to divine. There is no verbiage in the New Law. It is cool and clear. "All you foreigners of every nation,—should you come to the territory of the Celestial Court, be you people of any country whatsoever, so often as Opium is brought, in all cases, in accordance with the New Law, the parties shall be capitally executed, and the property entirely confiscated. Say not that it was not told beforehand." Captain Elliot, on the receipt of this Proclamation, put forth a public notice to all British subjects, dated the 11th May, in which he clearly explained the inevitable effects of this New Law.

"By this law the ships and crews of all nations, henceforward arriving in China, are liable to the penalties; the first, of confiscation; and the last, of death, upon the determination of his government that they have introduced Opium.

"It places, in point of fact, the lives, liberty, and property of the whole Foreign community here at the mercy of any reckless foreigners outside, and more immediately at the disposal of the Hong-merchants, Lingwists, Compradores, and their retainers."

Capt. Elliot is perfectly right in his anticipation of the natural results of the Law, and he very aptly illustrates the indiscriminate confiscation and massacre to which it must lead, by referring to the sixteen individuals, who, under the plea of being more deeply implicated in the importation of Opium than others, have been detained as hostages for the complete delivery of the drug. Not a few of these have never been engaged in any contraband transactions whatever! The New Law will be executed in the same spirit of recklessness and injustice; the innocent will be confounded with the guilty; and the lives of the most honourable merchants will be at the mercy of any informer or enemy, without the possibility of any interference on the part of their own Government.

It must be evident that this Edict puts an end to all foreign commerce in China. In its endeavour to root out a noxious branch of trade, the Celestial Government has laid the axe at the root of all commercial intercourse. The question of closing the port against British merchants has not been left optional with Capt. Elliot; it has been emphatically settled by the Chinese themselves. It is well known that twenty thousand chests and more of Opium are only waiting the smallest appearance of an opening to be thrown into China. The opportunity will be anticipated, or rather created, if it do not present itself. The Lady Grant brings information that the smuggling vessels, now that the Chinese have done their worst, were ready to proceed to the Eastern Coast; that they would go prepared for resistance, and that the contraband trade would now be conducted with more boldness than ever. Is it to be supposed, after the specimen we have had of Chinese faith and justice, that on the first appearance of an Opium vessel on the Eastern Coast, even if there should be no hostile collision with the Preventive Service, the property and lives of all merchants residing at Canton, however unconnected with Opium transactions, will not be held responsible for the transgression? In these circumstances, to continue at Canton, and risk life and property, by placing it within reach of the Chi-ness, would be an act of insanity. This is the light in which the question is already viewed by the merchants in China; and upon this view of it they are now prepared to act.

It is scarcely possible to conceive a state of things more difficult to deal with. The Boundary Question in America is a trifle compared to it. In America, our dispute is with a people, proud, it is true, of their national independence and importance, perhaps to as great a degree as the Chinese, but a people whose minds are open to the dictates of reason and justice; to the voice of common sense; to the calculations of interest, both public and private. But in the case of China we have to deal with a nation of superlative arrogance; deaf to the voice of reason and justice, and whose conceit and insolence make them altogether unapproachable. Just at this juncture, too, their national vices have received a ten-fold augmentation. By a coup-d'état they have forced from us the delivery of twenty thousand chests of Opium; and this is, doubtless, considered a fresh proof of their superiority and of British weakness. All attempt at negotiation appears, therefore, to be hopeless. Unless some effectual measures can be adopted to restore the dignity of the English character, and to reduce the Chinese to the necessity of adopting an equitable basis of future intercourse with foreigners, our trade with them cannot be revived. Our intercourse is now virtually suspended by their own act. If we could afford to continue the suspension for a year or two, there can be little doubt that the falling off in their revenue would assist in bringing them to their senses. Far be it from us to suggest the most distant hint of hostilities. But it is possible that Her Majesty's Ministers may demand reparation for the violence which has been offered to our Representative; and on its being refused, dispatch a fleet to blockade the river of Canton, and to intercept all the maritime trade of the country; and this, it is said, would cut off such distress on the people as to threaten a general rebellion, and induce the Chinese to come to a fair negotiation. That negotiation, however, can be opened on no other condition, than that the English Government shall faithfully unite with the Chinese in putting down the Opium trade; and this trade is accordingly at an end.

The measures which have now been taken by the Chinese Government, can scarcely fail to produce a fatal effect on the Memorial for re-imbursement, which the Opium merchants have just sent home. Nothing could be more untoward than the simultaneous arrival of this disastrous intelligence, and of the Memorial. The stoppage of the trade will fill England with consternation; the people, at the prospect of losing their tea, and the Ministry at the idea of losing their revenue. The irritation will pervade all ranks of society; for the suspension of our intercourse with China cannot but affect every interest; and as on all occasions of general calamity, so on the present, the people of England will require a victim. Can any thing be supposed more inopportune than the arrival of this Opium Memorial, just at the juncture when public indignation is boiling over? If that indignation could become vocal, may we not suppose it to find vent in some such language as this. What, you Opium smugglers, who have nefariously entailed us with the Empire of China, at a time when we had more quarrels on our hands than we knew how to deal with; who have deprived the Exchequer of between two and three millions sterling of annual revenue; who have deprived this great nation of its national beverage; do you, the authors of all these calamities, venture to approach us with a petition that we should make good, from our own pockets, the losses you have suffered in your unholy enterprise?

We have received a remonstrance from a member of the mercantile community in Calcutta, stating that the Memorial was not signed by all the merchants; and that in saying "the merchants of Calcutta had sent home a memorial," we have indiscriminately involved all in the responsibility of that measure. We acknowledge our error; but how can we correct it, unless the names of the Memorialists be published?

THE MIDNAPORE DISTRICT.—Mr. G. C. Page has lately published several letters in the Englishman, descriptive of the universal corruption which pervades the Native Officers in the district of Midnapore. Instead of dealing in useless and general declamation, he has descended to details, and pointed out item by item, the various contrivances by which they manage to divert a lakh and a half of Rupees a year from the oppressed Natives, into the channel of their own gains. We have no doubt, that were a close investigation made by European Officers who can speak the vernacular language of the district, the charges would be fully substantiated; and we think that if the officers extended their enquiries to other districts, the results would not be dissimilar. The propensity for illegal exactions is part and parcel of the national character, and is not confined to the district of Midnapore. Whether the old Hindoo Rajahs gave their subordinate officers salaries of sufficient amount to remove all excuse for extortion, we have no means of ascertaining with exactness; but we suspect that even in those golden days, the public officers lived more by their wits than upon their allowances, and trusted to the general corruption for impunity. We know that under the Mahomedan sway, all the officers of Government, from the highest to the lowest, were expected to exhibit a practical illustration of the maxim that 'power is money.' The extortions which were universally practised, were winked at by the controlling authority, in order that the sponge might attain the requisite degree of saturation before it was subjected to a hearty pressure. Venality and corruption (though not always injunctive), reigned for six centuries in Bengal, with little or no check; the principle became inveterate, and it has acquired all the strength of the most active habits. Many years of unmitigated care, of wise management, of a discreet application of hope and fear must elapse before this national vice can be eradicated.

While we contemplate the state of things here, we must not forget that official integrity is a plant of modern growth, even in our own favoured land. It is not quite a hundred and fifty years since the East India Company gave a dowry of Ten Thousand Pounds Sterling to a Duke of Leeds, for the benefit of his support. A hundred years have scarcely elapsed since Houghton rose into magnificence by other means than the Premier's patrimony or his pay. It might be useful also to remember that the beneficial change in the character of our modern functionaries, which enables them to look back with surprise on the corruptibility of a former age, has been accompanied by a double and treble increase of allowances. We have as yet but begun this part of the experiment in India, and we must not be too hasty in our expectations of fruit. The remedy must long be applied before the inveterate habit of centuries will be found to give way before it. If there be any member of the government so unreasonable as to expect official integrity to grow out of official poverty in the soil of India, we say he must be a hard and unwise master.

But the mere increase of salary will not produce the desired effect, without an active and untiring European superintendence. And what adequate European agency has Government at command, for example, in this district of Midnapore, that it should expect integrity in the Native functionaries? The district is a hundred and fifty miles long, & hemmed broad, with a population of a million and a half of inhabitants. In this vast population we have three, four, perhaps five European civil officers, so completely overwhelmed with business, that it is utterly impossible for them to do ought but go through, and that with difficulty, the routine of a daily duty. If, for two or three days, they raise their minds from the petty details of office, to a more comprehensive class of duties, the arrears of business soon brings them back to the desk. Where is the time for the due supervision of the Native Officers, which is, indeed, one of the most important elements in their reformation? If we were simply to raise the salaries of the Natives, without increasing the control on their conduct, we should do little but remove the opprobrium of injustice from our administration. Contrast the administrative strength of this district with that of Ceylon, which is also an Indian possession. That island, with a population of one million, just two thirds of that of Madras, has thirty-eight civilians, besides sixteen provincial Magistrates, independent of the Native Officers and Judges. It is, of course, impossible to increase the public officers in each district in Bengal in the same ratio; for our finances would not admit of it; but the fearful disproportion which now exists between the work to be done, and the honest agents who are to execute it; between the magnitude of our expectations, and the insignificance of the means by which they are to be realized, might be diminished. Till we are able to multiply the number of European functionaries in the interior, and to increase the checks on Native depravity,—bribery and corruption will flourish; and Mr. Pargue will fill the columns of the Englishtman in vain with a catalogue of oppressions which there are no means of correcting. As well might we expect to stem the torrent of the Ganges, as to stem the current of Native extortion by the agency which is now at command.

THE NEW MAGISTRATE ACT.—The period for passing the New Magistrate Act into law approaches; yet the ungrateful community in the City of Palaces, notwithstanding all the prompting of the Press, cannot be induced to meet and priton for the continuance of the present system. In these circumstances, it would be redundant to renew the discussion of the subject; but we happened the other day to stumble on a passage in that most amusing publication—"Sons Slicks," relative to the Trial by Jury, which all our readers may not have had an opportunity of perusing. We are sure they will be amply repaid by its humour and raciness for the trouble of reading it.

"But I was agoin' to tell you about the French court. Arter I closed the consarn about the pictur's, and shipped 'em off in a Cape cutter that was there, I fell in with some of our folks on their way to London, where I had to go to afore I returned home; so, says I, s'pose we hire a vessel in Co. and go by water to Marseilles; we'll get on faster and considerable cheaper too, I calculate, than agoin' by land. Well, we hired an Egyptalino to take us, and he was to find us in bed, board, and liquor, and we paid him one-third in advance, to enable him to do it gentel; but the everlastin' villain, as soon as he got us out to sea, gave us no bed-clothes and nothin' to eat, and we almost perished with hunger and damp, so when we got to Marseilles, Mes friends, says I, for I had picked up a little Egyptalino, mes friends, comme longo alla courto, will you? and I took him by the scruff of the neck and tossed him into court. Where is de pappia? says a little skip-jack of a French judge, that was shook full of grins and grimaces like a monkey arter a pinch of snuff,—where is de pappia? So I handed him up the pappia signed by the master, and then proved how he cheated us. No sooner said than done, Monse Sheer Bell frog, gave the case in our favour in two-words, said Egyptalino had got too much already, cut him off the other two-thirds and made him pay all costs. If he didn't look hunsquabbled it's a pity. It took the rust off of him pretty slick, in my depend.

"Begar, he says to the skipper, you keep de bargain next time; you von very grand damne rogue, and he shook his head and grinned like a crocodile, from ear to ear, all mouth and teeth. You may depend, I warn't long in Marseilles arter that. I cut astik and off, hot foot for the elannel, without stopping to water the horses or liquor the drivers, for four Egyptalino would walk into my ribs with his stileto, for ha was as savage as a white bear afore breakfast. Yes, our courts move too slow. It was that ruined Expected Thorne. The first time he was taken up and sent to jail, he was as innocent as a child, but they kept him there so long afore his trial, it broke his spirits, and broke his pride,—and he came out as wicked as a devil. The great secret is speedy justice. We have too much machinery in our courts, and I don't see but what we prize juries beyond their real vail. One-half the time with us they don't understand a thing, and the other half they are prejudiced. True, said I, but they are a great safeguard to liberty, and indeed the only one in all cases between the government and the people.

"The executive can never tyrannise where they cannot count, and juries never lend themselves to oppression. Though a corrupt minister may appoint corrupt judges, he can never corrupt a whole people. Well, said he, far be it from me to say they are no use, because I know and feel that they be in certain cases most invaluable, but I mean to say that they are only a drag on business, and an expensive one too one-half the time. I want no better tribunal to try me or my cases than our supreme judges to Washington, and all I would ask is a reserved right to have a jury when I call for one. That right I never would yield, but that is all I would ask. You can see how the lawyers vail cash by the way they talk to 'em. To the court they are as cool as cucumbers,—dry argument, sound reasonin', an application to judgment. To the jury, all fire and tow and declamation,—all to the passions, prejudices, and feelin's. The one they try to convince they try to do the other. I never heard tell of judges chokin'. I know brother Josiah the lawyer thinks so too. Says he to me, once, Sani, says he, they ain't suited to the times now in all cases, and are only needed occasionally. When juries first come into vogue there were no judges, but the devil of it is when public opinion runs all one way, in this country you might just as well try to swim up Niagara as to go for to stem it,—it will roll you over and over, and squish you to death at last. You may say what you like here, Sani, but other folks may do what they like here too. Many a man has had a goose's jacket lined with tar here, that he never bought at the tailor's, and a tight fit it too, consid'rin' its use without measurin'. So as I'm for Congress some day or another, why, I gitt fall to and flatter the people by eliminatin' in with them. I get up on a stump, or the top of a whiskey barrel, and talk as big as any o' em about that birth-right—that sheet anebor, that incestu, that blessed shield, that glorious institution—the rich man's terror, the poor man's hope, the people's pride, the nation's glory—Truth by Jury."

THE SOCIETIES.—According to promise, we give another selection of notices of the Annual Meetings of our Religious Societies; and our files up to the 15th May contain no more reports of such meetings as seem worthy of record. When the next Mail arrives, we shall have another selection to make; for several institutions of considerable importance had not held their meetings, when the last Mail was despatched.

Before proceeding with our discussion of the merits of the Society system, we take this opportunity of fortifying the points we have already taken, by an extract or two, which will shew that we have good authority for the statements we have made. In the Memoirs of the Rev. J. P. Porter, of Bath, we find the following extract from his private journal for 1824: "Mr. ——— thrust himself into my pulpit in a very offensive manner to plead for a collection for the ———. Religious beggars are become a nuisance indeed: surely it cannot be pleasing in the eyes of infinite purity to see so much chicanery, treachery and artifice to procure money. To me it is detestable."

These are the strong expressions of a good man, galled by the intrusion of the Society system, upon the peaceful and profitable course of his ministry for the good of souls. They have the advantage of bringing before us a fact of actual occurrence; but it may be objected, that they were produced, as much at least by personal irritation, as by principle and judgement. To meet this objection, we will quote the reflections of Mr. Porter's biographer, the Rev. P. Cater, a man of the most liberal mind, who by no means stands aloof from Societians. On Mr. Porter's text, Mr. Cater, in 1834, published this commentary: "It is to be feared that many abuses exist in the religious Societies of the present day. Too much of the public money may be, and often is, expended in the maintenance of stipendiary agents and itinerant orators. In some of the public Societies, nearly forty per cent. of their income is absorbed in expenses. Even our anniversaries and public meetings may sometimes degenerate into occasions for personal exhibition and oratorical display. At these times recourse is had to every species of art to obtain a full house. Large placards are posted on the public walls and chapel doors—advertisements are inserted in Newspapers and Magazines—the names of eminent individuals are announced—the house is crowded—speeches are delivered—the applause is great—and, in conclusion, a notice of collection is announced with an intimation that never did the Society stand in greater need of funds. This statement may be true, and there may exist among the speakers no sinister design of erecting the Society's standard to suspend upon it their own honours and applause; but the system is not only liable to abuse, but it is abused to a great extent: and whether it might not be so altered as to be rendered more conformable to the simplicity of a kingdom that is not of this world, is a question worthy of serious consideration."

Happily this important question is now meeting with very general consideration: which need not be wondered at, when so long ago as April 1819, the manifest evils of the present system, then but in its immaturity, drew from the great Robert Hall such a letter to his friend Dr. Ryland, as the following:

"My esteem for your character is such, that it is impossible for me to differ from you in opinion, or decline complying with your wishes, without considerable pain. I feel that pain on the present occasion. I am truly concerned to find your purpose is to form an Auxiliary Society at Bristol, to have public days, &c. &c.; being deeply convinced of the truth of that axiom of our Lord's, that 'the Kingdom of God cometh not with observation: or as' Campbell translates it, 'is not ushered in with parade.' The Baptist Society has prospered abundantly, with the blessing of God, under a different management; and the unobtrusive modesty of its operations has been one of its strongest recommendations. That Society has done much, and said little; it has shewn itself in its effects, not in its preparations. I am much grieved that it is about to relinquish that praise, and to vie with others in the noise and ostentation of its proceedings. It reminds me of the fable of the frog and the ox. * * * * * Why should we at last imitate what we have so long condemned? Why should we attempt a competition in a point of view in which we are sure to appear to a disadvantage? The expense of collecting ministers from remote places is not small; and, supposing their expenses to be borne out of the public fund, (and the situation of few allows them to travel at their own expense), it will, I fear, more than counterbalance the pecuniary advantages resulting from the efforts at publicity. I have serious apprehensions that the ostentatious spirit which is fast pervading all denominations of Christians, in the present times, in the concerns of religion, will draw down the frown of the great Head of the Church,* whose distinguishing characteristic was humility. He did 'not strive, nor cry, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street.' I am persuaded nothing can be more opposite to your own disposition than such a mode of proceeding, on which account I am the more surprised you should be induced to lend it your sanction. There appears to me a very simple and efficacious mode of supporting the Baptist Mission, without noisy appeals to the public. Let every Baptist Minister make an annual collection in his congregation, and apply to his more opulent members, and hearers besides, for their annual subscriptions; and all the money will be raised which ought to be raised by our denomination. With respect to others, the success of the mission, attested by its periodical reports, will not fail to make the right impression. The best Auxiliary Societies, in my humble opinion, that can be devised, are already prepared to our hands in regular organized churches, and in the certainty of meeting some hundreds of professing Christians every Sabbath-day. I hope, my dear brother, you will not be offended with the freedom of these remarks. Were I to consult my inclinations, an excursion, in the pleasant month of July, to Bristol and to Wales, would be highly gratifying; but, from the consideration I have suggested, I must beg leave absolutely to decline your kind invitation. I do extremely deprecate the precedent about to be set at Bristol."

We leave these statements to make their own impression, and proceed with the Anniversary Notices.

The 6th Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Sailors Society was held in Finsbury Chapel, on Monday evening, the 6th May, Lord Mountstuart in the chair. The Secretary read the Report, which stated that every department of the Society's operations had succeeded beyond their most sanguine expectations. The receipts, including the sale of £450 stock, had been £2,360-16-6; which exhibited an actual increase of funds to the extent nearly of £200. For much of this, the Society was indebted to the various Auxiliaries, and the distribution of "Britannia," of which 5000 copies had been offered by the Publishers to the Committee at prime cost. The two Thames Missions had boarded 7,915 vessels in the river, and 1,100 in the docks and canals: they had conducted nearly 350 religious services afloat, had obtained 791 ships for agents, and circulated about 150,000 tracts and books. The Society had employed seven stipendiary agents, who, in connexion with the Missionaries, held 18 or 20 meetings in the week for prayer and the exposition of scripture. A positive change had taken place in the moral character and habits of seamen. The Report strongly urged contributions for the erection of the Metropolitan Seamen's Chapel. The communications from the Society's agents in the provincial ports were highly satisfactory. The Committee had especially turned their attention to continental agencies: and the labours of the Rev. J. Peers, the Society's Missionary at the Cape of Good Hope, had been signally successful. The cause of the Society was advocated by the Rev. J. Burnett, Lieut. Fabian, R. N., Sir C. E. Smith, the Rev. Dr. Patten, the Hon. Capt. Wallgrave, R. N., G. F. Angus, Esq., the Rev. Mr. Crofts, and Lieut. Brown, R. N.

The 25th Anniversary of the Irish Evangelical Society was held in Finsbury Chapel, on Tuesday evening, the 7th May. The chair was taken pro tem. by Thomas Chubb, Esq., but afterwards occupied for the evening by Charles Hindley, Esq., M. P. From the Report it appeared that the labours of the Society had been eminently successful during the past year. The instances of conversion from Popery were very numerous. The Scripture readers were prosecuting their operations with unabated of order. The Committee had to lament the decease of the late T. Walker, Esq., the Treasurer of the Society, who had testified by his will the deep interest he felt in its welfare. The receipts of the Society had amounted to £2,968-10; the expenditure to £2,968-9-4; leaving a balance in hand of £30-0-8. In moving the adoption of the Report, the Rev. Dr. Stuart, of Dublin, observed, "The Hon. and Rev. Mr. Spencer has recently said you that he has handed every priest, every friar, every lay-brother, every lay-sister in France, and throughout the Continent, in prayer for the re-conversion of Britons to Romanism. And I can tell you that there is not a town, village, or hamlet, in the length and breadth of Ireland, in which there are not at present chapels, magnificent and splendid, in the process of being reared, with funds evidently derived, not from Ireland, but from distant regions. Under these circumstances, when I believe that the labours of Roman Catholics, as well as of the Protestant world, are concentrated upon my country, you may, perhaps, ask, well, and are you terrified for the result? No! I have no fears for the result." The Rev. J. Young, in seconding the motion, said, "Let me not be mistaken, however; I do not blame the Roman Catholics. They have the same right to disseminate their sentiments that we have to diffuse ours. If their success be obtained by fair and open means, we have no ground whatever to complain. But my fears were confirmed by the observations of a gentleman at the Bible Society Meeting, who had lately been in Rome. He had an opportunity of conversing with a great many of the clergy of Rome, and he mentioned that among them the usual topic of conversation was the re-conversion of Great Britain and Ireland to Popery, and that their hopes of success were very great. He asked them the grounds of their anticipation, and they mentioned several. In the first place, that Her Majesty's Ministers were colonizing Catholic Churches in the Colonies; that Oxford was doing their work so completely, that they had nothing to do themselves but look on; and farther they alluded to the great increase in the number of Popish Chapels in this country, built in great part by the money of Protestants. These facts are startling, and I, therefore, consider it an encouraging circumstance that this Society and others can come forward, and detail to us instances of conversion from Popery. If there be a dark side, there are, too, bright and hopeful indications." The Rev. Dr. Lislefield, in moving the second resolution, said, "There is such a delightful fancy about the expressions of Irishmen, such materials for spreading the Gospel when they know it, that it delights the heart whenever you have an opportunity of witnessing it. If you say to an Irishman, 'You must pray in the morning,' he replies, 'I shall be off with the flight of the night.' I said to a peasant of the lady at whose house I was residing, 'James, you want more commerce in this country.' 'Your honour,' said he, 'see how all the five rivers are running like.' I firmly believe that there will be found among the Irish, when they are brought to understand the Scriptures, many new arguments against Popery—although the old ones are sufficient. I know a case where an individual was brought from Romanism to acknowledge of the truth. She read the scriptures for the first time, but had read no books of controverted divinity. I asked her, why it was not right to worship the Virgin Mary? To which she replied, 'Because our Lord said, 'Whoever will do the will of my Father, the same is my mother, and sister, and brother'—and so we must worship them all.' Another said, 'I am sure there is no purgatory now.' 'Why?' 'Because it is said that every man's works shall be tried with fire; and the priests say that theirs will not; therefore, I am confident that this passage must mean something else.' Mr. Alderman Kershaw, of Manchester, seconded the resolution. The third resolution was moved by the Rev. Dr. Fletcher, who observed, "I wish that all Protestants adopted the maxim of wealth and affluent members of the Roman Catholic Church in this country; namely, that the first object of their solicitude, and the first object to which their wealth is to be appropriated, respected their religion in this and other lands. I know that there is among Roman Catholics a scale of generous contribution—of self-denying effort—of prodigious liberality, noted on by the wealthy and affluent members of that Church, that ought to put the wealthy and affluent members of all Protestant Churches to the blush. It is on account of this, that I would give them their due meed of honour for thus setting on their convictions, however I may lament those convictions." The meeting was further addressed by the Rev. R. Knill, T. Challis, Esq., the Rev. J. Barnett, and the chairman.

The Anniversary of the Newfoundland and British North America School Society was held in the Lower Room, Exeter Hall, on the 26th April, Lord Bexley in the chair. His Lordship stated that no support was at present rendered to the schools of the Society but by unsalaried clergymen; and there were great difficulties as to communication, so that the visits of the clergy could only take place at long intervals. The Society had undertaken to extend its operations through a large portion of North America, but without adequate support the work would be greatly embarrassed. The Report stated the receipts of the Society had amounted to £2,048-7-8, being an increase of £261-7-7, besides £274-8, raised for the specific purpose of erecting, enlarging, and repairing schools. The local contributions had amounted to £1,033-0; making a total, for the ordinary objects, of £3,108-18-2. The expenditure had been £3,476; and the liabilities for the current year were about £2000. The chief speakers were the Bishop of Chester, the Rev. Mr. Herbert, and the Rev. F. Close.

The 50th Annual Meeting of the Naval and Military Bible Society was held, in the Hanover Square Rooms, on Tuesday, the 7th May, the Marquis of Cholmondeley in the chair. Lieut. Col. LeBlanc read the Report. 12,538 Bibles and Testaments had been distributed during the past year. The receipts had amounted to £2,804-0-8; the expenditure to £2,823-15-8. The speakers were Capt. Sir E. Perry, Capt. Anderson, R. N., Admiral Hawker, Rev. Mr. Hughes, Capt. Clark, E. I. C. Service, Rev. W. Marsh, Capt. Hon. F. Maule, Capt. Layard, Admiral Oliver, and Capt. Vernon Harcourt, R. N.

For the General Baptist Missionary Society, a Sermon was preached by the Rev. John Stevenson, in Zion Chapel, New Church Street, St. Mary-le-bone, on Lord's-day evening, the 21st April. The Annual Meeting of the Society was held on the following Tuesday evening, when Sir G. E. Smith took the chair. The receipts of the Society for the past year were £2,508-16-10½; the expenditure, £2,868-3-4½. It is hoped the funds of the Society will be greatly augmented. The speakers were the Revs. John and E. Stevenson, Broad, Preston, Burns, Grainger, &c. The field occupied by the Society is the province of Orissa, where the Missionaries, Messrs. Lacey, Sutton, Brooks, Subbings, and Wilkinson occupy the stations of Cuttack, Pooree, Berhampore, and the adjoining village town of Midnapore.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JULY 25.

The Fancy Sale held yesterday at the Town Hall, for Mrs. Wilson's Refuge, was numerously attended; and we are happy to find that the proceeds amounted to the respectable sum of Two Thousand Six Hundred Rupees.—The unexpected quiet which has followed the death of Nanjett Singh, is not likely, according to the last accounts, long to continue. It is said that Rajah Dheeran Singh, though he has sworn to be faithful to the present King, has a greater partiality for his abler brother, Sheer Singh; and the elements of discord are now in a state of fermentation.—The Hurkar states that the Enterprise Steamer goes to the Eastward in the course of a week.—The intelligence received at Agra, from Simlah, is to the purport that a war with the Burmese is inevitable; that three armies of fifteen thousand men each were about to leave the capital for the southern provinces, under the command of three of the King's sons. From each army we may safely take off a cypher, without any damage to the truth. The military stores which have been largely imported from Pondicherry into Rangoon, have equally been the subject of exaggeration.—The Calendar of the Criminal Sessions at Bombay is very heavy; there are no fewer than seventeen cases of the highest sort, of which three are for administering poison with intent to murder.

FRIDAY, JULY 26.

A hostile meeting took place yesterday between Capt. Macnaghten and Mr. Hollings, which grew out of some remarks which appeared in the Delhi Gazette, about two years ago, and which Capt. Managhten considered derogatory to his honour. He went out with Mr. Hollings, and after receiving his fire unhurt, left the ground, declaring himself satisfied. The Englishman, whose antipathy to duelling has been so frequently published in his journal, has, apparently, taken the opportunity of this occurrence to ridicule the practice, by stating that Capt. Managhten, after receiving the fire of his antagonist, refused to fire himself, and declared himself satisfied with the eternum. An odd kind of statement, indeed, for a man who considers himself aggrieved to call upon his opponent for the satisfaction of a gentleman; which satisfaction or statement consists simply in giving the aggressive party an opportunity of doing him the farther injury of shooting him.—Letters have been intercepted from the Amcra of Seinde, to Dost Mahomed, through the activity of Lieut. Codrington, which disclose a scene of treachery on their part, which renders a rupture with them all but inevitable. It is stated that Government has received letters from the Resident at Bhoj, in Seide, which puts it in full possession of the intrigues of these men. No unwise is it in a country like this to do things by halves. We have made them inveterate enemies, and left them in full possession of the means of annoying us.—At Monsieur Dopni's fancy ball on Wednesday, the harmony was disturbed by certain gentlemen who wear the garb, and pass under the designation of gentlemen; and who appear to have gone thither for the express purpose of kicking up a row.—Mathooranath Mallick, a wealthy Native of the liberal section of the Native community, has just died at Sulkea. This family arose to distinction to the service of the Rajahs of Burdwan.

SATURDAY, JULY 27.

Important intelligence has been received from China, by a vessel which left it on the 11th May, and has arrived at Calcutta. For particulars we refer to our editorial notice.—Major Thorley has been appointed to the difficult post of Resident at Jerrap, where disorders have reached a pass, beyond which they cannot be borne. It appears that the Minister and his brother have appropriated to themselves no less than 20 lakhs of Rupees of the property of the former Minister, Jutha Ram, of which they have not as yet been induced to give up more than five lakhs. Nothing can exceed the disorganization of this state.—An important case has just been heard and determined in the Supreme Court, relative to the adoption of an heir by the Rajah Iodernarayan Roy. It is remarkable as being one of the shortest suits for one of such magnitude, which has been for a long time disposed of by the Court. The Judges upheld the adoption.—The Harbuz states, on the authority of the Natal and Military Gazette, of the 13th April last, that the Half Batta Order has been rescinded. We hope the news is only premature; though when we consider that the Court seem to have most unfortunately chosen this measure, to show the firmness of their character, we fear the intelligence is altogether unfounded.—A letter appears in the papers, stating that the son of the late Rajah Ran Mohun Roy, having failed to obtain a situation under Government in this country, is now returning home to England to push his fortunes there.

MONDAY, JULY 29.

The Bombay papers confirm the unfriendly news from Seide. One account states that fifty thousand rupees are collected in and about Hyderabad, embued with deadly feelings towards us, and ready for any enterprise. The Amcra themselves are worse than lukewarm.—Two of the chieftains, tributaries to Holkar, have for some time back had two youths from Bombay to teach them English. The experiment, which was urged on by Mr. Bax, the Resident, has totally failed. The sons of nobility have refused to go on in their studies, and their tutors have abandoned the ungrateful task.—The Semiramis Steamer has, it seems, sustained no injury from going ashore into the field of clover; two Committees have come to the conclusion that she has sustained no damage which would prevent her going to sea again.—The Rajah of Travancore has nobly subscribed for twenty shares in the Comprehensive Steam Fund. His Dewan, and other Ministers, have followed the example, and the total number yielded by this place is thirty-one.—Mr. Walter Elliott, the Private Secretary of Lord Elphinstone, and Member of the Board of Revenue, having obtained leave to visit Egypt, has gone on to Mahia, which is in Europe; and the Court of Directors have sent out word that, according to Acts of Parliament, his allowances must cease from the date of his embarkation, and the situation he held be forfeited.—A copper plate has been dug up in Gonerat, dated A. D. 812, the era of Charlemagne. It is a deed of gift of land to a brahmin, and contains these remarkable expressions:—"He who grants lands lives 60,000 years in heaven, but he who confiscates resumes, or allows others to do so, is doomed to hell for a like period. Those who resume lands granted by others will become black serpents in the dry holes of the forests of the Vindhya mountain. Oh ye virtuous Kings, respect the grants of lands (given by others,) for to preserve their grants is better than a fresh donation." The Englishman asks if Mr. Managhten will get safe home. Yes; any thing on the copper plate, notwithstanding. The object of Mr. Mangra and of the Government, is to separate the lands which have been given from those which have been usurped; the good from the bad; the sound from the rotten tenures; to uphold the former, and resume the latter. None of our honest Deputy Collectors need, therefore, fear that they shall be doomed to hell for sixty thousand years, or become black serpents.—Lieut. Kittoe is preparing to publish a work of great interest. Illustrations of Indian Architecture, from the Mohammedan conquest downwards.—A splendid procession has set out with the ashes of Ranjeet Singh, and of the unfortunate women who humiliated themselves at his funeral pile, which are to be consigned to the Ganges at Hardwar. We have given a full account of it in our extracts.

TUESDAY, JULY 30.

Letters have been received from Calcutta, dated the 18th of June, which state that the troops had not marched up to that day. One reason given for the delay was that they waited for treasure; another, that they waited for a conveyance of provisions. The rumours regarding the future conduct of Dost Mahomed, are as vague as ever.—The Harbuz states, that Col. Young vacates his situation in the Law Commission, on the 1st of next month, and resumes his post at the Union Bank.—In the same paper it is stated, that Mr. Robertson and his colleagues having displayed a right feeling on the subject of Resumption, in a few days it is to be announced that Resumption is no more. We thought the principle of the resumption operations had been recognized by the Court of Directors, an authority paramount to that of the Local Government.—From the same paper also we learn that Mr. Taylor decided 700 cases in our day; we thought the number was 400; but like Shakespeare's blackman men, they have, perhaps, the faculty of sudden increase.—The Albany Steamer, which left England on the 6th of March, reached Bombay on the 15th July, after a remarkably expeditious voyage of four months and nine days.—We are most happy to learn that the Court of Directors have agreed to the terms on which that munificent Native, Jamsjee Jeejeebhoy, of Bombay, proposed to devote a lakh of Rupees to the establishment of an Hospital.—Mr. Tutton has left Bombay on his voyage to Calcutta, in the Columbo.—H. M. Ship, the Vulgar, has just left Madras for China. H. M. Ship, the Comery, will proceed in the first instance to Trincomalee, and from thence either to Hongkong or China.—The proprietors of the new Bombay Bank have, it is said, petitioned the Bengal Government to postpone the opening of the Institution to the 1st March next, but as this Government is governed by a perverse hatred of Bombay, it is feared the favour will be denied.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

RUNJEET KING'S FUNERAL PROCESSION.
We have to thank an intelligent native friend, formerly, we believe, a student of the Delhi College, but now at Lahore, for the following account of the first day's march of the procession, conveying the ashes of the late Maharajah, and those of his Ranees and slave girls to the Ganges at Hardwar:—

Every thing having been prepared, the previous day, for the removal of the ashes of the late Maharajah Ranjeet Sing towards the Sacred Ganges at Hardwar, the procession left the palace at about an hour after sunrise, on the morning of the 2d July, and started through the city of Lahore towards the Delhi Gate in the following order. One Squadron of Sikh Lancers, one by one, on account of the narrowness of the streets, followed by five gold cloth flags carried on foot, in the same order; a little in the rear of those came a golden Khassah or Yalkie, containing the ashes of the late Maharajah; the Premier, Rajah Deohan Sing, on foot to the left bearing a peacock feather chowry, and driving away the flies; and on the right, Jaunahar Khoswal Sing, also on foot bearing a golden punkah; on the left and near to Rajah Deohan Sing, was the late Maharajah's principal chuttry bearer carrying a golden chuttry, and immediately behind came his personal servants, such as dressers, chowry walis, cup bearer, &c. &c. &c.; a little behind came four Khassahs containing the ashes of the four Ranees, burnt with him, followed by a fifth containing the ashes of the seven slaves also burnt with him, and immediately behind marched his favourite horses covered with gold; about fifty paces behind them came the Heir to the Throne, Kurrukk Sing, on an elephant, dressed in plain white muslin, followed at a short distance by the whole court in the same dress, without any kind of arms, and mounted on elephants. On arriving at the Delhi Gate, the procession received a salute of eleven cartridges per gun from Captain Ford's, Elli Bakh's, Emsah's, and Soothanmood's Artillery—(amounting to about twenty-six pieces drawn up there for that purpose) and proceeded through a street formed of a Squadron of the body guard, Captain Ford's and Mr. Steinbach's two Battalions of Infantry, at a slow pace; and receiving the salute of those two Regiments, turned towards Hamh (a favorite Barah Durry of the late Maharajah, about six miles from Lahore, being the first march). Half way to Hamh the procession passed through a street formed by Kurrukk Sing's Regiment of Cavalry, two Battalions of Infantry, and four guns; and received a salute of eleven cartridges per gun. East of Shalamar, again the procession passed through a street formed of two Battalions of Infantry and two guns, belonging to the Misir, from whom they received a salute of eleven cartridges per gun—and lastly on arriving at Hamh (the place of halt for the day) and on entering the line of sentry surrounding the Barah Durry, the procession was received by a Battalion of Monsieur Anisabli's, under a salute of eleven guns. At the Barah Durry, close to which there was a splendid tent pitched to receive the remains of the noble old Maharajah, the procession stopped; and the ashes were deposited in the tent; every thing was conducted as if the worthy man had been alive travelling about. The line of sentry, the door-keepers, &c. &c. all with the same exactitude; so much so, that a person accustomed to his way of travelling, and arriving, unaware of his demise, would not have seen any thing that could have led him to suspect that deplorable and mournful event; except, perhaps, the absence of troops and the Sirdars and Umlah's tents, &c. &c. and even these omissions, to persons who had travelled with him, would have created no surprise, for how often have the tents (except the Maharajah's which always followed him on elephants) not come up, for several hours after halting; and even then, how few would hazard to pitch for the day; knowing that no dependence could be placed on the Maharajah's movements; for his people often watched, until late evening being so far advanced, there could be no chance of moving till next morning, to go nobody knew where, before they thought of making themselves comfortable for the night.

The Sikh troops, accompanying the remains, are said to be in a high state of discipline and order, and to do great credit to their different commanders, especially a Squadron of the Lancers under Captain De la Rooha's command, who are a remarkably fine body of men, and well equipt.—Delhi Gazette, July 17.

NEW PUBLICATIONS IN MARATHES.

"What good have the British done for India?" is a question, which has lately elicited some interesting discussion in the co-lums of our contemporary of the Times. While one party is of opinion, that "a foundation has been laid by the British Government, for the future happiness and prosperity of this country, such as was never before laid or attempted to be laid by any conquerors in the world;" another argues that, of what has been done is not at present "worthy, in its results, of being exhibited as the boon of a civilized nation." The benefits that have resulted from the British Government, as put forth by its partisans and admitted by their opponents, may be divided into those of an indirect and a direct kind. The first class includes the suppression of petty warfare; the extirpation of the Peshwarries, Thugs and other classes of freebooters and murderers; and the abolition of brutal punishments, Suttee, and Infanticide. In the second class may be mentioned the security of persons and property with its inseparable bonus of civil and religious liberty; the institution of schools and the publication of books for the promotion of native education; the establishment of a free press and the communication with the remotest parts; and the construction of roads; the abolition of transit and other duties; and the institution of the agricultural societies and commercial banks. Whether these benefits are such as India is entitled to receive at the hands of the civilized nation which at present holds sway over its vast extent; or whether they are now or can ever be a sufficient recompense for what India has lost by its subjugation to a race of foreigners, is a point which has not been alluded to by the champions on either side; and it is not our object in noticing the discussion to direct attention to it. It will be well, however, if the advocates of the superiority of the present Government would keep this point always in view; for in order to estimate the happiness enjoyed by a country just brought under a foreign yoke, it is necessary not only to consider the intentions of its rulers and the means employed by them for its improvement, but also to compare the benefits derived by its inhabitants with the sacrifices which the change of dynasties necessarily produces.

Leaving this point, therefore, out of the question, as well as the consideration of the exact amount of good which the policy of the Government is calculated to develop, we think it will at once be admitted that the steps taken by our rulers, some of which have been enumerated above, undoubtedly manifest a desire to promote the prosperity of the people committed by Providence to its protection. In saying this, we shall not be understood as assenting to the views of the partisans of Government, with respect to the importance or triviality of some of the measures adduced by them as the foundation of future happiness. For the utility of several of them may be justly questioned, and what is still greater consequence, some can in no way be attributed to our rulers in their public capacity. For instance, the translation of the Bible was never directly encouraged by Government; and we may safely declare that with respect to the tendency of this measure, the opinion of those who direct the affairs of India is far from being unanimous.

All we mean to say is that the public acts of the British Government, such as the establishment of schools and colleges, the construction of roads, the institution of surveys, &c. afford ample evidence to satisfy every impartial mind of the benevolence and purity of its objects. We neither agree with the party which would make it appear that India is now rapidly advancing to a state of happiness, and that the English nation has done all in its power to benefit its Asiatic subjects; nor does our opinion coincide with those who would maintain the opposite extreme, and attribute all the measures of Government to a principle of aggrandisement and selfish policy. We most unhesitatingly admit that what the Government has been doing is highly beneficial to the country; but in order to remove the evils inseparable from a foreign conquest, great deal more is necessary to be done before it can be said with truth, that a solid foundation has been laid for the future happiness of India.

We have said above, that, an opinion directly contrary to that promulgated by the admirers of the present system prevails in some quarters. It will be easily understood, that sentiments of this kind will naturally be entertained by those, who, either from being removed from the seat of Government or from want of general intelligence, are incapable of understanding and weighing the motives of its proceedings. That such is the state of feeling among the generality of people in the interior, is known to all, who have any opportunities of conversing with them on such subjects. Though in the present state of the natives, long accustomed, as they have been, to bear the heaviest oppression and injustice from their rulers, the existence of such feelings as those above adverted to, need not produce any anxiety; yet it is highly desirable that these incorrect impressions should be corrected; especially at a time like the present when the mind of all classes of people, being awakened from its lethargy through the instrumentality of education, is likely to take a bias unfavourable to the interests of Government, and prejudicial to their own prospect of happiness.

Nothing can so effectually check the growth of this evil than the circulation of tracts and small works, explaining the objects of the measures which the Government adopts from time to time and the principles on which they are founded. It is on this ground that we notice with much satisfaction the appearance of the three, small tracts, the names of which are placed at the head of this article. They have been published, we hear, under the patronage of Government, and are intended for distribution in the Government schools throughout the country. As is evident from their titles, their object is to explain the motives of Government in sanctioning the construction of roads, the cultivation of the Mauritius sugar-cane, and other measures lately adopted to improve the condition of the country. It is thus stated at the end of one of them.

"The object of writing this tale is this. Though the Government is doing good to the people in many ways, they do not understand it and attach blame to the measures of government. By doing so they injure themselves. I solicit the readers of this tract, therefore, to follow any advantageous suggestion that may be offered by government or by any other person. They should not bring disadvantage to themselves through idleness."—Hombay Times, July 13.

CENTRALIZATION AND LOCALIZATION OF GOVERNMENT.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR:—The above seems one of the numerous questions of Constitutional Policy which, in India, are left to take their chance; and yet I submit, that on the just fusion of the two principles of centralization and localization depends the good working of Government. To accomplish a due combination of the two is a most difficult task; but it is not, therefore, difficult merely to initiate a tendency to such localisation, as may, at least, mitigate the engrossing centralization of our present Government at every one of its Presidencies.

In consequence of such concentration, the Ruler is constantly obliged to decide on many matters of merely provincial and even parish business;—he has to decide with a telescope on remote affairs, requiring the close inspection of a microscope—to decide on whole bundles of papers which he cannot pretend to read. Although (as the excellent San Sikh expresses it,) "only able to see things in glare," and nothing in particular," he is obliged, under the present system of engrossing centralization, to descend to trivialities, so as to suggest the task attempted by the King in Mr. Bayes's Rehearsal.

"Give us the fiddle; we ourselves will play."

The freedom of internal commerce, and the still more artificial conditions of society, which must result, will continue to present an increasing multiplicity of provincial and parish business, much of which the Governor will despair of even looking at; and a Governor will thus become (at least, in regard to matters of internal administration,) a mere abstract principle of government, with this important peculiarity, that he will always stand committed to justify, as his acts and orders, all that has virtually been done by others under his name: the case will, in fact, be analogous to that of the Sovereign of England being responsible for her Ministers' acts, instead of the converse: the evil being also greater in proportion to the size of the country for which the single central power undertakes to be universal dry nurse.

When a functionary is thus overwhelmed with duty, and undue responsibility, he despairs of doing right; and, therefore, takes refuge in doing only what is least committing of himself: he is unable to do all, and, therefore, does nothing; particularly when the duties presented are so multifarious, that he cannot inspect them sufficiently, even to judge of their relative importance: thus, "quies non moros" will become the only principle of our internal Government. But when a Ruler, acting on this principle, flatters himself, at the end of his administration, that he has succeeded in the object of leaving things as he found them, he is generally much deceived; as in perhaps all such cases an order process of deterioration has been in operation: for it is most certain, that in Government not to advance, is to go back. As Lord Bacon says—"Since things alter for the worse spontaneously, if they be not altered for the better designedly,—what end will there be of the evil?" Sir T. Munro, even with all his immense experience, the implicit confidence of his official superiors, and the advantage of co-opinants and disciples to work out his principles, was content, after seven years administration, to leave things seemingly as he found them: but the falling off of revenue* under his Presidency, is now a matter of special attention and enquiry. But to reiterate the above question of Lord Bacon; what end will there be of the evil,—what does this continuation of power—this tendency to top-heaviness lead to?

I submit that, if a Government continues thus to over-build its base, without taking even the initiative means of counterbalancing in itself the people, and to speak more particularly, the provincial municipalities—the whole structure raised on this unextended base, can be upheld only by false supports, namely, the ignorant prestige of the people, and a large standing army. I have observed that the first of these is being rapidly destroyed by the Press; and, therefore, we must hereafter lean more and more on the latter supporter! the tendency will, therefore, be, not to good, but to what may be termed saevus Government—or, as I have said, to a Government of entry boxes—which the disaffection of a people, (necessarily injured by the un sympathizing and inevitable neglect and ignorance of a remote centralised power,) will, when these evils are defunct to them, and exaggerated, and their disaffection is also taught its object by the Press, render more and more necessary.

For what are we deferring the instruction of the lowest orders? Are we waiting till they deteriorate to a still lower degree of pauperism and mere animalism? Are we to act as the Dutchman who, to take a good run for his leap, went so far back, that when he had arrived at the leap, he had run himself out of breath? The work of self-government is to be slowly proceeded in, even in mere local affairs; but it is not on that account to be tardily commenced at. Even as it now is, the necessity of drawing off to the provinces some of the new energies which are running to a congestion at the Capital, may be more urgent than we suppose. We are, by means of the Press, letting in new familiarities and questionings of the Government—letting in new waters, and have not commenced to prepare the channels, the sluices, and the embankments which are to regulate and confine the new element. I now venture to say, that the Press is an element of disruption between the ruling and the ruled castes of India: it involves all the dangers, without the usual benefits of a free Press. On one side it vilifies the ruling to the ruled caste, while none who write to the ruled caste, seek to counteract this vilification—and even when the disparagement addressed to the ruled caste is just, it is not seen by the ruling caste, so that they might amend the offence. Our trusting the Natives with a free Press to set against the general government, seems an inconsistency with our trusting them with the institution of municipal freedom, which could act only on local government.

It may be urged that the papers read by Natives, have but small circulation; but that circulation is in the dense and explosive atmosphere of the capital; and what is read by one, may fly on the wings of a hundred winds to a thousand hearers: the spirit may be long in kindling; but when it does kindle, it will (particularly if there be at the same time a desperato cibi), extend like wildfire. "Confers injurias at interpretando ascendit," is (according to Tacitus) dangerous policy.

To sum up this unconsciously long letter, and to use a figure which is well known to medical gentlemen. The heart is becoming swollen, and a consequent wasting and torpor of the extremities follows—such torpor often ending in—convulsions. However, a course of steel, saltpetre and lead pills may suppress such

* To Sir T. M. much was given, and from him much was required; but, judging him—not by his writings—but by the paucity of his uncondemned measures of internal policy, I think him little more than an ordinary man. Even where he erred, it was in the capacious and injudicious policy. His ideas were all borrowed from Mahomedanism; and even if his measures had succeeded, his status should rather be crowned with a turban than with laurel. As to his writings, they pleased rather by flattery and tickling, than by exciting the thinking faculty: they opened no new sources of thought. In legislation, his avowed principle was quo antiquius eo melius: his rights, according to Coleridge's expression, were like those of a vengeful stern—all shut backward: his intellect not was prospective.

† I submit that the Government might set up a Native paper, to be given gratuitously, if it cannot be sold. Semi-official intelligence, as well as general education, might be united in this work, and it might, at times, be found useful in counteracting seditious effusions of false religion.

equivalent for a time—that is, if they do not occur at the Capital; for in such case, though the rising may be as rapid as that of the disturbances of China, the suppression may not (in a season of famine) be equally so.

Though not constitutionally an alarmist, I should not be sorry if my very feeble voice could excite some salutary apprehension of the danger I have been indicating: for after all, danger is the only true reformer in favour of the people. It is danger which best makes those in power see and appreciate all the beauties of popular justice. I lately heard of a person, rather high in authority, having said that if we do not be careful, the favoured ones will lose their annuities, which are dependent on the territorial revenues; and in such words there is more significance, more of actual history and earnest of justice to the people, than in most reports and minutes that have been written—many of such reports, &c., being, I fear, of little more avail than the bones with which the highwayman, M. Daval, used politely to regale those whom he had divested of their personal effects: at least I am so far not a mere alarmist, as I also make an attempt (however humble) to point out how the new elements of danger may be mitigated, and duly dispersed, through the provinces* where they may find a multitude of escapes, instead of the one vent to which all are now tending.

Yours,

CASSANDRA.

SPEECH OF THE BISHOP OF NORWICH, AT THE MEETING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.—THE BISHOP OF NORWICH then rose and was received with enthusiastic cheering; on his ascension he spoke to the following effect:—“This is the third time, my lord, I have appeared on this platform on a similar occasion; and I rejoice to say that I repeat not of having done so, (Cheers.) Such it has happened that I have had the honour of sitting by Lord John Russell, one of the illustrious members of Her Majesty's Government.—(Applause.) and now equal to the satisfaction I feel, in sitting by your lordship, who has gone hand in hand with that noble lord in supporting a system of education based upon the Holy Scriptures—the only education which is worthy of a man to receive. (Cheers.) Your lordship is more intimately connected with Ireland than that noble lord. I have followed your footsteps: I have watched your progress; and I rejoice to see you ruminating that benevolent course which so dignifies your name. (Cheers.) Let your system, your views, be carried out then, and I may say in the words of the Psalmist, that when the education which you support is carried out in Ireland—in that wretched and desolate country—“her mountains also shall bring peace, and the little hills righteousness unto the people.” (Loud cheers.) But we must be cautious; perhaps, my lord, you are not aware of the company before whom you are sitting.—(Laughter.)—If but one-twentieth part of the reports which have been industriously and assiduously, and may I say eloquently, disseminated, in almost every meeting upon the subject of education within the last twenty years, are true, you and I are sitting among a company before whom a Christian man would be ashamed to show his face. (Laughter and loud cheers.) I speak not without my book.—(Laughter.)—I speak not from recollection. I have the words before me, and I could give the evidence in detail but, after all, I believe we may rest at ease, for our gracious Queen is patroness of our Society; and, so long as she sanctions this meeting, and consents that her name should be associated with such bad company.—(Laughter and loud cheers, in which we lost the conclusion of the sentence.) The above words have been uttered upon so plentifully and so richly may he divided into four or five heads. (Laughter.) If you will allow me, I will give you one or two. In the first place, the people of England are told that it is the object of Government to adopt a system of compulsion—to compel education. I do not wish to ask a Cabinet secret.—(Laughter.)—but I pledge myself that if I were to ask it, the answer given would be this—no compulsion was ever thought of. (Cheers.) Compulsion is not the way to produce education. (Cheers.) We must go forth and show its value, and the people will then be wise enough to receive from us so goodly a boon. We have been told that we associate with Jews, Turks, and Infidels. (Laughter and cheers.) I doubt the fact; but supposing, if true, I see no disgrace in it. (Cheers.) If I could stretch out my right hand to a Turk, and receive him as a friend, and with my left hand place the Bible in his—would it be disgraceful thus to associate myself with a Turk? (Cheers.) Is it nothing that by presenting him with the inspired volume I might induce him to relinquish the worship of a sanguinary prince, for that of the Prince of Peace? If, again, I hold out my right hand of fellowship to the Jew, would it make the disgrace if, in a similar manner, I handed to him a copy of the Bible, in which he recognized the true Messiah.—(Cheers.)—and that I induced him to adore the cross—“despising the shame.”

Again, suppose I hold out my hand to the infidel, is it nothing if, by putting the Bible in his other hand, I should thereby convey that satisfaction to his soul which the Bible alone can give? (Cheers.) We are further told, strange as it appears, that in our system we are anxious to exclude the Bible. (Laughter.) I have before me a pamphlet which reads, in the morning, in which that statement is contained. The statement has reference to large schools at Liverpool, where great progress is making in education, and it is said that in those schools the Bible has been excluded. I will quote the words: for were I to give them from memory it would be thought that I had invented them. The writer says, “Moreover when he saw a petition from the Protestant operatives of Liverpool, complaining that the Bible was excluded from the schools, and that they were under the necessity of removing their children therefrom in consequence of the Bible not being taught therein; and that the petition was got up at a public meeting, of which a highly respectable clergyman was chairman, he could not entertain a doubt respecting the statement that the Bible was some side not only not taught in factually excluded from those schools.” Such is the accusation. Now for the facts. A spin and deliver, inquirer, we heard this statement, visited the schools, and here is the dialogue which took place between him and the master:—“Is the Bible, the actual Bible, taught in this school?”—“Yes, every day.”—“During, or after school hours?”—“During school hours.” So much for the charge that we are excluding the Bible—he could give twenty instances; but, ex uno disce omnes. (Cheers.) Next we are told that the Bible is excluded from the education of the destitute of religion, and deprived of the Bible; and next we are told, in documents laying on the table, that instead of this we are introducing an education composed of an omnium gentium of latitudinarianism. (Loud laughter.) These are the terms there employed. It is moreover added, that “the system of education we are about to propose as national, is one of the most impudent farces ever introduced to the notice of the world.” These questions are sufficient to show the designs of our enemies. Allow me, in answering these defamatory charges, briefly to glance over the different systems of education which are now going forth under a Liberal Government. In the first place I would touch on that system of education which your lordship has under your notice in Ireland. No man can regret more than myself that the whole authorized version is not constantly in the hands of the penitentiary of that country; but where we cannot do all we would, we should not be blamed for doing all we can. (Cheers.) We are endeavouring to disseminate the road for the introduction of the Bible into every cabin, and to place it in the hands of every Irish peasant. (Cheers.) It is nothing that we disseminate through that land portions of Scripture which I hesitate not to say contain every essential doctrine which a Christian and a Protestant are entitled to hold; and that we disseminate these over the country in the hope of exciting a desire for the perusal of the whole book from which such valuable extracts are taken. That this effort is produced is manifest. By the Report of the Hibernian Society, I find that it has already, in round numbers, distributed in 23 years 400,000 copies of the Bible or Testament.—(Applause.)—but the point to which I wish to lead you is this, that within the last eight years alone this national system has been in operation, the number circulated has been increased in a most extraordinary ratio. During the last year not less than 40,000 copies were introduced among the peasantry of Ireland.—(Cheers.)—the greater part of which fell into the hands of the Roman Catholic population. (Applause.) The next system to which I will refer, is that of apian of the central system of education. I do not wish to wander aside into any degree with the persons composing that committee—some of them I have the honour of calling my friends; I know them to be religious men, and men who would rather forfeit their hands than sanction an education which was not identified and associated with religion. One of those gentlemen is, indeed, a Roman Catholic—Mr. Wyse; but I, at the risk perhaps of my character, must confess that I am one of those who think that Christian feeling may best be in the bosom of a Roman Catholic.—(Hear, hear.)—and that he may value the truths of Christianity as much as a prelate of the Established Church. (Loud applause.) But the accusation is founded upon this, that they separate in some degree the secular from religion. I would advise those who object to the system proposed by the Central Board of Education to go to a Church of England school founded, as nearly as possible, upon the principle of the Central Board of Norway, where they will see a thousand children educated in the most perfect manner in secular and religious knowledge, but the one separated in some degree from the other. Thus the children on a Monday taught religion, is, on a Tuesday, taught to make his own clothes and shoes, while the leisure time on each day is devoted to gymnastic exercises, so conducive to his health. We will now come to the British and Foreign School system, against which some extraordinary accusations have been brought. I will not trust to memory, but I will read the words. We are charged with introducing an education "essentially defective as Christian doctrine;" we are charged in the next place, that this Society, "instead of teaching the whole Bible . . . virtually does no such thing; the letter of the Scripture is so read and taught, that the spirit of the sacred volume is lost, and many of its essential doctrines excluded;" and last of all it is said, that our system "commences with trampling in the dust everything which the party bringing the charge "as a Churchman venerates." (Laughter.) I think a stranger charge cannot well be made. It is for this company, who have examined into the defects, and who have been present during the examination of the Borough School, to say whether this is a matter of fact or whether it is an abuse, a false imputation of our name. (Cheers.) It happened to me to superintend the examination of the school. (Applause.) Be cautious how you applaud. (Laughter.) I went there as a spy, to examine into the nature of the land. (Laughter.) I introduced an examination most incidentally. I had heard that the Society was tainted with Unitarianism, but I have before me a document coming from the highest authority, proving that there is not the slightest association between the British and Foreign School, and any Unitarian doctrines whatever. (Cheers.) Those who were present at the examination will bear testimony to the fact that I examined the children from Genesis to the end of the Epistles. I dwelt long and carefully on the extracts read in the school, relating to the divinity and the character of the Saviour. That part consisting of no less than eight closely printed pages, referring to prophecies and facts tending to confirm that blessed truth, that our Saviour was divine in his nature, and that he was indeed the Saviour of the world. (Cheers.) I was truly established as the result of the examination. I have examined many schools; and, alas! having been a subject upmost in my mind, and dear to my heart, the greater part of my life—(Applause)—and I may safely say, that I cannot recollect a single instance in which the scholars were so fully conversant with every topic contained in the Bible from the beginning to the end. (Loud applause.) I was astonished beyond measure. I will state one fact. I called for certain prophecies relating to our Saviour, and there was a confusion of tongues like that at the tower of Babel. (Applause.) I then ordered the boys to speak separately. One boy immediately started with a prophecy, he was instantly followed by another, and they carried on the fire throughout the class, each giving a prophecy applicable to the divinity of our Saviour. (Applause.) I beg to read but one single sentence out of the Report on Education, lately delivered to the House of Commons. "In the midst of these conflicting opinions there is not practically that exclusiveness among the church societies, nor that indifference to religion, among those who exclude domestic instruction from the school which their mutual associations would tend by standards to suppose. Much, therefore, may be effected by a temperate attention to the false claims of the Established Church, and the religious freedom sanctioned by law." This is a most important and most gratifying confession; it is liberal in itself, and it has the advantage of being true. (Hear, hear.) Yes, the Church of England has been, and I say it, if there are dissenters present, occasionally misled by dissent. It has been said that it is liberal and exclusive. Aod, again, I think I need not say, that the Church of England, on her part, has been a little too warm, too fierce, too much dealing to high pressure upon the character of her dissenting brethren. (Cheers.) I will not enter into details; I simply state the fact, and I leave it to truth. It has been the great object of my life to promote that system of love by which these differences might be prevented, and to produce that millennium—the millennium—the millennium for in this world—Dissenters, Churchmen, and Christians of all denominations, walking in the same path-way in their advancement to heaven. (Loud cheers.) Dissenters have said to the Church of England, you are too exclusive, you will compel our children to learn the catechism though they have never had sponsors. I deny the fact. There is one instance to which I will allude, because it is in print before me. If time permitted I could give you a most gratifying list of allegiances of whom are of higher degree than you are aware of, who are willing and anxious so far to concede to the Dissenters as not to hurt their feelings. In a large town, containing 12,000 inhabitants in connexion with the Church of England, a printed paper has been signed by the master of the national school, at the instigation of the Clergymen, and addressed to the Dissenters who are respectfully informed that such children as are sent to have had the advantage of Christian baptism and sponsors, are not questioned on that part of the catechism which refers to sponsors. Here is a proof that when the Church of England is charged with being illiberal on this point, all the Clergy and all the schools are not liable to be called before the bar of the country. (Applause.) Amongst Dissenters I stand fearlessly, proud of being a Churchman, and of the high station in which I am placed in the National Church of the land. I am proud of that Church, because I feel that she has been the organ of conferring the greatest benefit on this land. The Church of England is rising from her lethargy. (Cheers.) That she has been lethargic, is no secret—(Hear, hear)—all confess it. But looking at the Clergy at the present day, he is a bold man, an abettor of falsehood unworship, who will say that she made of the Clergy are not scoldenly devoted men, and anxious, as far as their strength, age, and their wealth will permit, to do all they can to promote the religion of the Gospel. (Applause.) On this foundation then I stand and address Dissenters. Let the Church of England lead the way to plant the banner of the cross in the breach of infidelity and sin; and you, Dissenters, make haste to follow after her, and bear her company in the warfare. (Cheers.) If the Church of England again relaxes into apathy, then let Dissenters, like Wesley, show that they are anxious for a revival of religion. You lead the way and shew us for our sinning. (Cheers.) If the Church of England, which God forbid, should ever desert her post, then, but not till then, may she be deserted by her country. (Cheers.) I am free to confess that the times we live in are little satisfactory, that the horizon on every side is dark and gloomy, and stormy. I see on every side but little consolation—much to apprehend. I fear that instead of going jointly down the stream of time, there will be a gulf drawn between Dissenters and Churchmen—(Hear, hear)—and that instead of amiable unity, if not collusion there will be slumber in the hour of time. I speak it in sorrow, not in anger. But though the sky is dark and gloomy, though the cloud is black and stormy, still there is a bright star before me, and I see a rainbow glimmering through the cloud. The comfort to which I look forward is this, that whether education be carried up by strife or good will, the people will be educated—(Hear, hear)—and therein do I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice while life continues. (Loud applause.) His lordship concluded by moving the second resolution.—Pat.

* The following is from the British and Foreign Review:—“As long as you suffer such stimulants, (those of the Press,) they must beget an appetite.” * What are you to do with the appetite? It must have food. It is for rulers to determine what is most appropriate. * If they will not allow people to agitate about a country or town-tax, it is quite sure they will agitate about a national tax. * What I submit is, that we must create in the natives an appetite for local politics, to divert them from those general and (to them) transcendental politics, to which the ignorant and desperate, when once supplied, are very prone; and (as De Tocqueville says) the municipalities must be the concealed breakwaters to part and turn aside the popular energies.

MISSESSA'S ORDINATION AT TREVOUR CHAPEL, BROMPTON.—On Thursday evening, the 22nd of April, a deeply interesting service took place at the Rev. Dr. Morrison's place of worship, Brompton, on occasion of the ordination of the Rev. James Legge, A. M., missionary to China. Though public worship commenced as early as six o'clock, the chapel was crowded to excess long before that hour, and hundreds, it is supposed, went away without being able to gain admission. The circumstances of Mr. Legge's prospective union to Dr. Morrison's only daughter, added to his youth, acceptableness as a preacher, extensive attainment, and devoted sphere of labour, all contributed to three around the service a peculiar and touching interest.

The introductory discourse was delivered by the Rev. Geo. Legge, A. M., of Leicester, brother of the Missionary, from the words of the Saviour, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." It was a burst of true eloquence from first to last, and presented, in a striking light, the attractive influence of the Cross as a medium of reconciliation, and an instrument of assimilation. The closing reference to the mission of his brother was so exquisitely tender, that it dissolved the entire congregation into tears.—Ibid.

POPIER CATHEDRAL IN LONDON.—Subscriptions are in progress for the erection of a magnificent Roman Catholic Cathedral in the western part of the metropolis, in the Gothic style, to be decorated with the most finished specimens of the art of painting and sculpture, and to contain 10,000 persons. It is said that the Pope is to come over to consecrate the cathedral when finished, and it is calculated that the edifice will altogether cost about 150,000*l.*—Chronicle.

EDUCATION.

RODBOROUGH, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—EDUCATION ON THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SYSTEM.—On Sunday, April 21st, two sermons were preached at Rodborough Tabernacle, by the Rev. W. Jay, on behalf of the new schools at Kingcote, which have been recently erected by the exertions of the minister (the Rev. E. Jones) and people of Rodborough, at a cost of upwards of 300*l.*, immediately after the enlargement of their place of worship. These schools are situated in the midst of a numerous manufacturing population, hitherto sadly deficient (in that particular locality) in the means of mental and religious improvement for the rising generation. The appeals of the venerable preacher in the cause of unsectarian education (which is grandy progressing in that neighbourhood) excited the deepest interest in the crowded congregation, and produced a very liberal collection, and it is believed, a strong and general determination speedily to pay off the remainder of the debt.—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NATIONAL CONVENTION, YESTERDAY.—Mr. F. O'Connor moved for the second time, the Convention should adjourn to Birmingham, after the 10th of May. A lengthened discussion ensued. Some opposed the removal, as the ground that it would diminish their usefulness by removing them too far from the centre of political business; others on the ground that they should not stir till after the petition was finally disposed of; and others on the ground that it would be now said that they were becoming cowardly, in consequence of the absence of so many delegates; and that they wished to secure themselves by settling among the bold and well-armed men of Birmingham. The motion was finally carried by a majority of 27 to 10. As the cost of the removal to Birmingham was to be defrayed out of the general funds of the Convention, a committee of three persons was appointed to make arrangements for the delegates' board and lodging in that town.—Pat. May 8.

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF CHARTISTS, on Saturday, dissolved their sittings in London, leaving Messrs. Cheve, Hetherington, and Rogers, as a committee to superintend the preparation of the Chartist petition. On Monday morning the members of the Convention left London by the steam-carriage train, to hold the National Convention in Birmingham, where they arrived the same evening, and immediately held an open-air meeting.—Ibid.

UNIFORM PENNY POSTAGE.—A deputation, consisting of about one hundred and fifty members of Parliament and the mercantile committee on postage, had an interview with the First Lord of the Treasury yesterday, on the subject of the speedy adoption of Mr. Rowland Hill's plan of post-office reform, as recommended by the committee of the House of Commons. The deputation was very courteously received by Lord Melbourne, who, after hearing Mr. Warburton and several other gentlemen in support of the measure, declared that he concurred in much that had been advanced as to the oppressive and disadvantageous operation of this tax upon the commerce and literature of the country, and in all that had been urged as to its severely prejudicial effects in a moral point of view; that he was anxious to facilitate the change; but that the only part of the question that induced him to pause was, that which had reference to the revenue, and upon this point he elapsed leave to reserve his opinion for the present, at the same time expressing the deputation to be considered the question of much importance, and desiring the prompt attention of Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was present, but took no part in the proceedings.—Times, May 2.

It is gratifying to know that a body of respectable merchants in the City can be found ready to take on themselves all the risk of the reduction, by cutting down the expenses of this branch of the public service at the proposed rate, and securing the Government in the full amount of revenue now derived from the Post-office department. This at once sets the question of revenue at rest.—Chronicle.

THE CANADIAN PRISONERS.—The Court has declined to give an opinion upon the legality of their transportation, but decided that they were lawfully in custody, and thereupon remanded them, leaving the Executive to decide upon the course to be adopted respecting them.—Pat.

THE WIGAN ELECTION COMMITTEE, on Saturday, came to the following resolution:—"That W. Evans was duly elected for the borough of Wigan, and that neither the petition nor the opposition to it was frivolous or vexatious."—Pat.

IRELAND.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, on Thursday so-called, Mr. Smith, Queen's Counsel, obtained a conditional order to set aside the verdict obtained against Lord Viscount Lorton, at the last Assizes at Longford, in the case of the Widow Murphy, which was then alluded to in the House of Commons. Mr. Smith stated that the issue, put in evidence at the trial, purporting to have been made by Sir Thomas Featherstone, for a term of eighty years, or on life, was a forgery.—Ibid.

THE REV. RADICAL DR. WADDE'S VICARAGE.—The Advowson of the church of St. Nicholas, Warwick, the vicarage of which is now in the possession of the notorious Dr. Wadd, has, we are happy to say, been purchased by the Countess of Warwick: for future, therefore, the inhabitants of Warwick may confidently look for a ministry of somewhat different character and attainments than the revolutionary divine now inflicted upon that town.—Cambridge Advertiser.

THE DOWAGER MARCHIONESS OF HASTINGS and THE QUEEN are Scotch cousins, both having a common ancestor in Sir Adam Mure, of Rowallan, in Ayrshire, an estate which the Marchioness possesses in her own right as Countess of Loudon. King Robert II., the first of the Stuart family that ascended the Scottish throne, married Elizabeth Mure, a daughter of Sir Adam, in December, 1347. The issue of this marriage was King Robert III., Robert Earl of Fife, Alexander Earl of Buchan, an elder daughter, who married the Earl of March, and a younger, who married John the White Kilt, progenitor of the Earls of Strathmore. By a genealogical tree which we saw hastily constructed, we find that her Majesty the Queen and the Dowager Marchioness of Hastings are tenth cousins. The Dowager Marchioness of Hastings and Lord Kellbourn, the member for Ayrshire, have a common ancestor in David, first Earl of Glasgow, which relationship was of essential benefit to his lordship in his late successful contest for the representation of the county.—Liverpool Standard.

DEATH OF THE FATHER OF THE SCOTTISH CHURCH.—The Rev. William Leslie, minister of the united parishes of St. Andrew's and Lhanbryde, county of Moray, died on the 19th inst. He was in the 92nd year of his age, and 66th of his ministry.—Jerusalem Courier.

RAILROADS have already so much affected turnpike trusts, that some trustees are known, in whose mortgages there is the receipt of only 40l. a year, where they used to receive 200l., and in many cases nothing will be paid.—Chester Gazette.

CHANGERS OF TIMES.—An old farmer, who lives not far from the Hamp-hire hills, observed lately, when talking of the extravagance and alteration of the times, that it was the fine words and flattery of men to the farmers' wives that had done all the mischief; "For," said he, "when it was dams and porridge, 'twas real good times; when 'twas mince and bread, 'twas worse a great deal; but when it came to be meat and soup, 'twas very bad."—Reading Mercury.

HOMICIDE OF A CHILD BY CHILDREN.—James Laffie, a child of two and half years, was killed on Sunday last, by falling through the broken balusters of a high stair case, on Arden's quay, to the bottom, when the little creature's head was fractured. The Mayor held an inquest next day, when Michael Hogan, a beggar boy, aged eight years, swore he saw William Hayes, younger than himself, push the child over the staircase, and that Hayes was aided in doing so by another boy, named Jeremiah Dunstoe. The Jury found a verdict according to evidence in this extraordinary case; and one of the alleged homicide, a child of tender years, is in goal.—Lincoln Chronicle.

COURT CIRCULAR.—The infant daughter of Lord and the late Lady John Russell was christened yesterday, 14th May, in Bucking-ham-palace, by the Rev. Lord Writchesley Russell, her Majesty standing sponsor. The ceremony was performed in the saloon, in the presence of her Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lord John Russell, Marchioness of Londonderry, Earl Spencer, Lady Georgiana Russell, Hon. Miss Lister, Mr. and Lady Theresa Lister, Marchioness of Northampton, Lady Florence Hastings, Hon. Miss Anson, Miss Dwyer, Marquess Leinster, Earl of Uxbridge, Lord Byron, and Hon. C. A. Murray. The font, of silver gilt, formerly belonged to George III. A disfranchised was afterwards served, to which all present at the ceremony remained, except Lord John Russell.—Pat.

MANCHESTER 300 YEARS AGO.—In the "Itinerary" of Leland, the antiquary, who died in 1552, we have the following:—"Manchester, on the south side of Irwell river, stonith in Salfordshire, and is the fairest, best buildid, quiknest, and most populous towne of all Lancashire, yet is it but one parish church; but is a College, and almost threeshort double lylle parishes, the lylde parishes, whereof a goodly one is hard by the towne. There be divers stone bridges in the towne, but the best of ill arches is over Irwell. This bridge divideth Manchester from Salford, the which is a large suburb to Manchester. On this bridge is a pray little chapel. * * * And almost it flye shotes without the towne beneath on the same side of Irwell yet be seen the dykes and foundations of Old Man Castle." ("Old Manchester in Burton's transcript of Leland's MSS.") The ground enclosed. The signs of the ruins of this castle were translated toward making of Bridges for the Town.—Ibid.

COCKFIGHTING IN HIGH LIFE.—On Monday, Mr. Henry Thomas, the Secretary to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, attended before Sir William Wiseman, Bart., and Count de Salis, at Chiswick, and lodged informations against 16 individuals, for aiding and assisting in a cockfight at Hillingdon, in the county of Middlesex, on Saturday, the 11th of May. Among the parties summoned were the following:—The Right Hon. Thomas Norton Fitzmaurice Berkeley, the Hon. George Charles Stanley Baring, Mr. George Henry Daulwood, M.P. for Chipping Wycombe, &c. Monday next is the day fixed for hearing the cases before the bench of magistrates at Ex-hidge.—Pat.

BURNING OF TWO THEATRES.—On Friday morning Cheltenham Theatre was totally destroyed by fire. It is doubted if another theatre will be built at Cheltenham. The night before, Thursday, at the Abbey-street Theatre, Dublin, flames burst forth shortly after the audience had quitted the building, and in the morning the scene presented a mass of ruins.—Pat.

AUSTRIAN POLITICS.—The celebrated Orientalist, Baron von Hammer Purgstall, has been dismissed from the public service in Austria, with a pension of retreat to enable him, he having forfeited the good opinion of Prince Metternich. Though he has ceased to be the "Court Interpreter," in consequence of the somewhat frank communication of a truth offensive to his masters—for the uncertainty of which the Baron made a neat apology—he continues to be an Aulic Counsellor Extraordinary for Foreign Affairs.—Pat.

EXTINCTION OF A GREAT SWEDISH FAMILY.—Stockholm, April 16.—The news of the death of Major Count Hans de Fersen, Aid-de-Camp to his Majesty, in the 37th year of his age, has made a deep impression here. With him the house of Fersen, of historical fame, is extinct in the male line. They derived their origin from Scotland, where their first known ancestor, Marianna, of the stem of Cathan, held, in the year 1160, in Lochaber, a rank in the church, called in Gaelic, Pharson (Fersen), from which is derived the name of Macpherson. The deceased's estate goes by entail to his nearest kin, Baron Axel, of Klukowitow, formerly a Lieutenant in the Russian service. Major Count Fersen had distinguished himself in the public service. A Fersen, who was Swedish Ambassador at Paris, executed a conspicuous part at the French Court in the last years of the reign of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette.—Pat.

JAMAICA ASSEMBLY.—The venerable Thomas Clarkson has addressed a letter to the Editor of the Morning Chronicle, expressing his joy at hearing that it was in contemplation to suspend the legislative powers of the House of Assembly in Jamaica on an object which he has had at heart for many years. "Had this measure been recorded to before," he remarks, "the benevolent intentions of the Legislature in establishing the Apprenticeship would not have been to so great a degree counteracted." In this sentiment of satisfaction, every sincere philanthropist, every friend to humanity must participate.—Pat.

AMERICAN BOUNDARY.—New York papers have been relieved to the 8th of April, which contain the satisfactory intelligence, that General Harvey has concluded with General Scott an amicable and honourable adjustment of the difference relating to the disputed territory. The matter is now once more in the hands of the Federal Government; and it may be hoped that no difficulty will be found, when both parties are at once reasonable and anxious for the settlement of the question, in solving the political problem of the boundary. We regret to find that the Canadian frontier is still infested by bands of American brigands and incendiaries. The Caffres of South Africa would be better neighbours. Unhappily, reprisals have been made, and mutual exasperation is the disastrous result of this disgraceful border warfare.—Pat.

The accounts received from New York by the Great Western, which are to the 23rd ult., show that all uneasiness regarding the Boundary Question had entirely subsided and confidence once more restored. Fires of a most destructive nature continued to be committed on the frontier, but nothing to alter the friendly understanding existing between the British authorities and the State of Maine.—Pat.

RAILROADS.—In the Journal of the Statistical Society for February, there is a very interesting paper on the railroads of Belgium; from which considerable encouragement may be drawn, respecting the introduction of those means of national prosperity into India. Of the importance of facilitating the internal communication of the country, it is unnecessary to say a word. Our rivers are at present our only highways; and many of them are shut up for a considerable portion of the year; the dangers and losses connected with their navigation are very great; and the tediousness, of at least the upward passage, is the subject of universal complaint, both with travellers and merchants. It would certainly be a great improvement on the present state of things, to open lines of canals, in those tracts where the precariousness of the river communication is most severely felt: and numerous as our rivers are, there are many rich and important parts of the country without any communication by them, and in which the construction of canals would be unsuitable. Roads are the great desideratum; and if roads are to be made, we may as well have the best that can be made at once. In England, in order to reap the advantages of railroads, the immense capital and skill laid out upon the turnpike roads have been freely sacrificed: but there is no need of repeating that expensive course of experiment in India. There are at least a few great lines, on which new facilities of communication are essential, for both the political and the commercial interests of the country.

On this point all are agreed. And, we imagine, there will be equal readiness to agree, that if railroads could be laid down in those lines, and the expense were not so enormous as to make the proposal absurd, they are the roads to be preferred. But, taking the probable expense from what has been done in England, every one who has thought of railroads in this country has been forced to give them up in despair. The cheapest railroad yet constructed in England, is one sixty miles long, between Newcastle and Carlisle, and it cost £10,000, or a lakh of Rupee, a mile. The Liverpool and Manchester line cost £38,553, or nearly four lakhs, the mile; and the Greenwich line cost £200,000, or twenty lakhs, for each of its first three miles. The estimated cost of 44 railways, for which Acts were obtained in 1836 and 1837, was on an average £17,600; and as in England the actual cost has always exceeded the estimate, and sometimes so far as nearly to double it, we may assume that the average expense of all these roads per mile will not fall short of £20,000, or two lakhs of Rupees. It would be idle to talk of introducing railroads into India at such a cost as this.

But in Belgium, the expense has amounted to little more than a third of this sum. Eighty-eight miles and a half have been constructed at an average cost of £6,995. In North America, again, the cost is said to fluctuate between £2000 and £6000, a mile; whilst one railway has been completed at so low a cost as £1,312 4. And when the circumstances which give Belgium and America so great an advantage over England are taken into consideration, it appears evident that India has every prospect of being found to enjoy the same. The peculiar expensiveness of English railroads is traced to a few prominent causes: 1st, the Per-sonal expenses in obtaining Acts of Incorporation have, in many cases, even in very long lines, exceeded £1000 per mile; and in the eight principal railways it has averaged nearly £500: 2d, The enormous demands for compensation by proprietors through, or near, whose land the railroads pass, have sometimes amounted to £10,000 a mile; and lately a nobleman in Essex obtained from the Directors of the Eastern Counties Railway, in consideration of his withdrawing opposition to their bill, £30,000 for land belonging to him, and £100,000 for injury done to his estate; the great injury and grievance being the interruption given to his fox-hunting! The average proportion of the cost of land and compensation, to the total expenses of the Grand Junction, and the London and Birmingham Railways is 13.7 per cent. Whilst in America, on the contrary, many individuals have made large donations to the Railway Companies, in consideration of the good done to their estates: 3dly, Extraneous expenses have been incurred by pushing the terminal of railroads unnecessarily into the heart of large towns, or leading the lines through them. And, 4thly, very heavy expense has been incurred by engineers aiming at a needless degree of perfection, both in the level and the direction of the lines. The economy of the Newcastle and Carlisle Railroads on the other hand attributed, in part, at least, to the judicious resolution of going round a number of obstructions, instead of going through them.

All these are sources of expense which would be avoided in India, as fully as they are in Belgium and America. And in the physical advantage of a level country, where no necessity occurs either for tunnels or sections of hills, we imagine it must greatly surpass them both. A line of railroad might be constructed from Calcutta to Delhi, not in the direct line, but, in a more useful course, in the champaign of the rivers, without a single tunnel, or a setting of any importance. It is true that this peculiarity would, in some degree, be counterbalanced by the frequent necessity of raising the road, on an embankment, above the level of the country, to avoid the annual inundations: but, this again, will be modified by the small cost at which such works can be effected in this country, through the cheapness of labour. The greatest difficulty, perhaps, would be in crossing the great tributary rivers: but it is not a difficulty that could not be overcome.

There appears to be nothing extravagant, then, in expecting that a railroad might be laid down in India for 40,000 Rs. a mile: and in many districts half that sum might, perhaps, be sufficient. But at 40,000 Rupee the mile, we should have 250 miles for a single crore, or a million sterling. The railroads in Belgium, of which we have spoken, are an undertaking of the Government: and it is much to the honour of that Government, that, in the doubtful and anxious circumstances in which they have been placed, they could accomplish so great a work as the construction of 159½ miles of railroad, between the 1st of May, 1834, and the 28th of August, 1838. They have done so, in such a manner as to carry passengers, in the cheapest conveyances, at the rate of 20 miles an hour, for a halfpenny, or little more than a pie, the mile. The undertaking in this country, should also, we think, belong to the Government: and when the present warlike disturbances are over, nothing more beneficial could occupy their attention. It would not create a very great pressure upon the revenues of the country to lay down 50 miles of railroad a year; and the outlay would be soon and richly repaid.

PROGRESS OF AFFAIRS IN CHINA.—Immediately after the publication of our last article on this subject, intelligence of an important character was received by the Canton Press from Canton, to so late a date as the 11th of June. Our relations with China have now, indeed, reached a fearful crisis; but this may only be the forerunner of a more sound, honourable and permanent intercourse; that is, if there be any truth in the oft repeated adage, 'When things are at the worst, they mend;' for it is scarcely possible for matters to be in a worse condition than that in which they now stand.

The whole of the Opium, twenty thousand, two hundred and eighty-three chests and a half, have been delivered up to the Imperial Commissioner Lin, who despatched a special messenger with the intelligence of his success to his Imperial Master, requesting to know whether the drug should be transported to Peking. The Emperor expressed his entire approbation of the measures by which the flowing poison had been secured; and as a token of his satisfaction, bestowed on his faithful Commissioner, the highest honours to which a subject can aspire. Regarding the disposal of the Opium, His Majesty observes, that the roads which lead to the metropolis are bad,—they have no Abercrombys in China,—and that the dispatch of so large a quantity to so great a distance, would subject the people to great inconvenience; he desires, therefore, that it shall be destroyed on the spot; thus manifesting to the Natives dwelling on the sea coast, and the foreigners of the outside nations, an awful warning. The Commissioner having received the Imperial command thus to read a great moral lesson to the outside barbarians, and to the inhabitants of the Coast, determined that the destruction of the Opium should be conducted with the highest pomp and parade. He directed that a stone-lined trench should be excavated at the Bogue, into which the Opium should be thrown, and mixed, and stirred up with unleaked lime and rock salt, and thus be destroyed before the eyes of the whole civil and military establishment of the Province. He directed that the drugs should be cast into the sea, that 'the Natives of the Coast and the foreigners might be made acquainted with the anger of the Emperor.' Thus have two millions and a half of British property been entombed in a Chinese grave. If the means by which the Opium had been obtained, had been as unexceptionable as the motive which led to its destruction, we might have considered this memorable action almost as bordering upon the sublime. But when it is remembered, that, however pernicious the drug, and however culpable those who introduced it, it was obtained by an act of unjustifiable violence, and by a breach of national faith, we fancy that the Commissioner will find, to his master's cost, that he has been sowing the dragon's teeth.

Capt. Elliot has retired from Canton, with those who had been detained as hostages. The Commissioner Lin states that he has embodied 'the heaven-like benevolence of his great Emperor, and remitted the punishment of their offences,' and banished them for life from the Imperial dominions, 'that they may preserve the favour and the majesty of the Emperor.' They have retired to Macao, which is now become the head quarters of the European community in China. Capt. Elliot, whose affairs had been brought to a close, issued a proclamation, enjoining all Her Majesty's subjects to quit Canton, stating that if they remained, it must be at their own risk and responsibility. It appears that a dozen merchants preferred to remain, ostensibly for the purpose of winding up their affairs, but in reality with the hope of still carrying on a commercial intercourse with the Chinese.

The last number of the Herald states, that letters are in town two days later date than the foregoing intelligence, from which it would appear, that the few junks of the Chinese had been assembled in greater numbers than ever in the river, and great numbers employed in the vessels there; that a European vessel had fired into a junk, which obliged those who had injudiciously remained at Canton to hasten down to Macao; that the smuggling of Opium had begun anew, by means of armed vessels; that the price of the drug had risen immediately after the funeral rites of the twenty thousand chests had been completed, to six hundred dollars the chest; that the Opium Clippers were preparing to start for the Eastern ports, to force the drug into the country at the cannon's mouth; and, finally, that the Portuguese, with Capt. Elliot, were fortifying Macao, under the apprehension of a hostile visit from the Chinese.

Such is the disastrous state to which matters have now been brought. We fear there will be much violence and bloodshed, in the inevitable contests between English armed vessels and the Chinese junks. These aggressions will naturally tend to exasperate the Chinese mind, and to render an amicable settlement more remote and difficult. How that settlement is to be brought about, it is impossible to divine. So difficult a political knot has not been offered to the sagacity of statesmen for a half a century; and the man who shall unravel it, will deserve to be immortalized.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORT OF IDOLATRY.—We regret to record that, notwithstanding the efforts of the Christian public in Britain, and the pledge given in the published despatch of the Court of Directors, the Pilgrim Tax at Juggernaut has not been abolished. The public had been led to expect that at the festival which has just passed over, the tax would have been remitted, and that the pilgrims would have been enabled to return to their homes proclaiming the intelligency of its abolition through India; but the tax was collected as usual. The blame of this breach of faith, which will not fail to meet with due reprobation in England, is, we understand, to be attributed to the local authorities. We learn that orders were received from Lord Auckland several months ago, to abolish the tax; and that His Lordship's directions embraced these particulars. 1st. That all classes of pilgrims should be allowed to pass free; that no tax should be levied, either by the officers of Government, by those of the Khoorda Rajah, or by the Priests. 2nd. That the control of the temple, and its affairs, on the part of Government should cease, and that the management should be entrusted to the Rajah of Khoorda, and under him to the officiating priests; and, 3rd. That, as Government had previously taken the lease of the temple into its own management, and assessed them, 40,000 Rs. a year should be paid towards the expense of the shrine, in lieu of them. Such are understood to have been the orders of Government relative to the temple; and it is thereby exonerated, in a great measure, from the censure which will assuredly follow so palpable a violation of the Court's orders. We learn that the district authorities have declared their intention to abolish the tax after the festival; that is, after they had once more filled the treasury with these unallowed revenues. But the same excuse which has availed for the neglect of the Court's orders one year, will be equally valid the next, and the next, and so during our tenancy of the empire, unless the remonstrance from Lordanah Street should be sufficiently pungent to induce reform. We entreat the friends of religious truth at home, once more to buckle on their armour, and to demand a reason for this renewed disappointment of these expectations, which were founded upon the pledge of the Court's despatch. If the avowed motive of gain induced this departure from those positive orders, it has been signally disappointed, for on no occasion has the attendance at the festivals been so meagre. Seventy thousand persons, it is calculated, formed the sum of the devotion; and of these, the great bulk was composed of men-women in the neighbourhood, who pass free. The remainder consist-of poverty-stricken pilgrims, to whom the remission of the tax would have been a boon, and who would not have failed to sound the generosity of Government in all the villages through which they passed on their return.

We hear that the Rajah of Klooda and the Pandas are preparing a petition to Government, praying that the alliance between the State and the Shrine may not be discovered; and it is surmised that some distant intimation of some pledge, by which Government is said to be bound, is to be introduced to give weight to it. Such a petition must, of course, be rejected, if the Court of Directors yet retain any influence in the councils of India. The objection which may be raised to the present measure, on the score of a pledge, may be disposed of at once, by a reference to history. We held the country three years before we touched the shrine; and we entered into an alliance with it, only to obtain the larger portion of its gains. What sad havoc has the examination of official records made with the pledges, which were some time since set up as secure crows, to frighten Government from the propriety of leaving Hindoo temples to the management of the Hindoos themselves!

While we are on the subject of Juggunnath we may mention, that the last festival in our neighbourhood was attended by a much smaller number than on any previous occasion. We have formerly seen from a hundred to a hundred and fifty thousand assembled; but the attendance this year fell off incredibly. This may be owing to the growing illumination of the age; or to its growing wickedness; for a few days before the festival, while the temple was filled with Brahmans, the image of the Sister of Juggunnath was carried clean off through the midst of them by a band of rogues, and has not since been discovered. A substitute was found for the occasion of the festival; but the dignity and credit of the shrine has received a blow, from which amidst the general spread of knowledge, it will not easily recover.

UPPER ASSAM.—We are happy to perceive from a Government Notification, that the territory in Upper Assam, which was judiciously bestowed on Poorunder Singh, and resumed some little time ago, has been bestowed to the Government of Bengal. Some of our readers may possibly remember, that the relinquishment of this fine tract of country to a ruthless baron has formed the subject of several articles in this journal. By that step, we deprived the inhabitants of a large portion of Assam of those political blessings which were enjoyed by their brethren around them; we planted an oriental and merciless despotism in the very cradle of a country which we were endeavouring to reanimate by just laws and a liberal administration. We were misled, partly by a kind of popular impression which existed on the subject, partly from actual misinformation, to attribute the unwise abandonment of this rich territory to an original proposal of Mr. Robertson, then Commissioner in Assam, by whom the measure was carried into execution. We were so happy as to be enabled soon after, through the perusal of authentic documents, to correct the injustice we had done to Mr. Robertson, and to place that transaction in its true light. We were enabled to show that it was not a measure adopted on his own responsibility, which Government was reluctantly obliged to confirm, when it could not be remedied; but that the arrangement had been the subject of a long correspondence with Government, and had been fully approved of by Lord William Bentinck, before it was carried into execution. The evil has since been fully remedied. Every stipulation which Poorunder Singh had made with our Government has been violated; his subjects have been reduced to the last stage of wretchedness by his extortions, while at the same time the tribute to the British Government has been withheld. The country has, therefore, been resumed, and annexed to the rest of Assam, with which it will now enjoy the same chance of improvement and civilisation. It must afford no little gratification to Mr. Robertson, who was the instrument of separating this fine country from our administration, to superintend its reception within the pale of our incursions; and to enjoy the opportunity of applying a cure to those evils with which it has been afflicted, since it was removed from our control. In a political point of view, with the Burmese to the East, whose pacific tendencies rise and fall with the lights and shades of our political horizon; with the wild mountain tribes in the north, fretting at the gradual approach of a civilised Government, it never could have been wise to leave an independent power, however despicable, in the heart of that kingdom. In an agricultural view, the annexation appears, if possible, still more desirable. If we mistake not, this country is admirably adapted for the extensive cultivation of Tea; indeed, without the absolute control of it, all our exertions to make ourselves independent of China, by turning Assam into a Tea garden, would have been cramped and impeded.

THE CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY, AND CHRISTIAN OBSERVER.—We have carefully looked over the few observations we made on the 11th ultimo, on the Calcutta Christian School Book Society, and are utterly at a loss to conceive what there was in them, to draw forth such an effusion as appears against us in, the Christian Observer of the present month. The violence of the Observer would fully justify us, in leaving his attack altogether unnoticed; and as he has had the kindness to place our article at the head of his own, we feel that nothing is needed by way of defence from us. But we have too much personal esteem for our assailant, to treat him with even the appearance of disrespect. We yield to his acknowledged worth a consideration, which is by no means due to his conduct on the present occasion.

In the article which has brought down the Observer's wrath upon us, we gave our sincere and hearty commendation to the entire object, and also generally to the Rules and Constitution, of the Christian School Book Society; and we took pains to recapitulate the principal circumstances which, in our opinion, entitled the Society to general approval and support. We did so, for the express purpose of drawing to the Society, the notice and favour of any who may attach some little value to our opinions on such subjects; and as much as possible to remove any prejudice excited by the tone assumed by the founders of the Society themselves. We thought their mistake in that matter might be lost sight of, in regarding the intrinsic excellence and importance of their object; and that they might be diverted from the temper into which they had fallen, by the remonstrances of those whom they could not but know to be friends both to them and their undertaking. But the Observer, with all his talk about what he can bear, is too sensitive, it seems, to endure any thing but unqualified praise. The reproach of a friend, is an unwelcome faithfulness; and its temperate administration brings down upon us a torrent of abusive imputation.

"If we have read our Bibles right, we have understood that whilst it was a Christian's duty, to be 'valiant for the truth,' and 'earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints,' yet 'the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves.' We have much reason to regret our own deficiency, in the happy combination thus required of resolute faithfulness with the meekness of wisdom. Nevertheless, we would seek its more perfect attainment, and recommend our friend, the Observer, to do so likewise, and, therefore, to eschew the fiery denunciation either of his fellow Christians, or of those who, unhappily for themselves, cannot be so esteemed.

The Observer marvels at our avowing the opinion, "that it is not fit the Government should take part in the promulgation of the Gospel, by teaching it in their schools;" and that we should set ourselves to expose the faults of the religious Societies at home: and in both particulars conceives we are sadly fallen from the spirit of our venerated predecessors in Serampore. From his wonderment, it is plain he has had but little acquaintance either with us, or with our illustrious Fathers, with whom it was our joy for many years to serve in the Gospel. The truth is, that, in both the measures for which he blames us, we but follow out their principles, and their conduct. When we look back on the sturdy dissentiment of Dr. Carey, we cannot but smile to think, that any one should conceive we differed from him, in holding that it was no part of the Civil Magistrate's duty to inculcate religion. The opinion which so startles the Observer, may be found in the very earliest numbers of this paper, where again and again it had the imprimatur of the last of the great three, whilst he yet was with us in the vigour of his judgement, 'and the maturity of Christian grace. As for the Societies, our predecessors themselves began the exposure of the evils attending their system, in their Quarterly Series of the Friend of India, as long ago as the year 1826: and their "Thoughts on propagating Christianity more effectually among the Heathen," were thence republished in a separate form, and widely circulated in two editions at home, and particularly in Scotland; where, we know, they greatly contributed to bring about the change in Missionary operations which has so happily been effected there.

Our sentiments, respecting the introduction of religion into Native education, were given very fully on the 28th April, 1836; and to our paper of that date we would refer the Observer. Then, as now, we stated, "we cannot think it proper to render public schools, supported from the public revenue, Seminaries of Christian doctrine; in which the religion of the people is, of necessity, to be assailed and overturned at their expense, but against their will." On the abstract question, of the duty of the Civil Government in respect of religion, we do not expect the Observer to agree with us: but we do not think him the less a Christian for what, in our eyes, is heterodoxy on that point; nor has he any right, because of our difference of opinion, to dispute the Christian consistency of our principles or character. But it is not on the abstract theory that the matter need be argued. The British Government exercise their authority in this country under solemn, voluntary, and often repeated engagements of perfect neutrality in regard to the religion of their subjects. Whenever, therefore, they abandon that neutrality, they will be guilty of a breach of faith, which no piety of motive will be able to sanctify, or to reconcile with the honour of the holy religion they might seek to advance.

If the duty of the Government be thus clearly marked out, there can be no difficulty in understanding how a servant of Government should feel himself bound to do one thing officially, and another thing privately. He may decline the service of the Government when he chooses; but whilst he eats their salt, he is bound, as an honest man, not to compromise them by officially acting in opposition to their principles and orders. But privately,—not as their servant, but as a conscientious Christian,—he, of course, would be a miserable slave had he not a right to follow his own convictions.

The fact is, that it is not the mere absence of Christian instruction, in the Government Schools and Colleges, that is peculiarly to be deplored. Nor did the evil, as it now exists in Calcutta, begin with Government. We remember the infancy of the Hindoo College, and, therefore, of all that has since been added to it: and we know the case to have been this. It was a voluntary Institution, founded by the Hindoos themselves: and by them was its platform laid. In laying it they were influenced by one simple principle, the dread of bringing in Christianity amongst their sons. They determined, therefore, that no Christian Minister should be a teacher in it, either of literature or science: and fearing even Christian laymen, they would have no European teachers, of whose infidelity, if not opposition, to Christianity, they could not be perfectly assured. When the supremacy of infidelity had been once fairly established, and its permanence was secured by a certain proportion of the College appointments, the managers of the College felt they could relax a little with safety; and for many years back there have been worthy, but tongue-tied Christian men amongst its teachers. The religious character of the Institution is not, and never has been, one of neutrality. It is a school of scepticism. By its means, Hinduism is falling to the ground; whilst nothing better is rising in its place; but, on the contrary, those who are released from the bonds of superstition are left without moral sense or principle.

We should be glad to look to the Christian School Book Society for an antidote to this deplorable evil. For if in publications are what they promise to be, and by purchase or gift can be introduced freely among the educated Native youth, they may be expected to have the happiest effect. It is our earnest desire, therefore, that no rash intemperance of its founders may interfere with its usefulness.

ONE WHO DEEMS THE PATRONAGE OF A SOCIETY A BARRICADE OR HOBNOB.—The Correspondent of the Cyclopaedia Christiana, Advocate, who assumes this designation, has published a rejoinder to our remarks, in that Journal; and though we are unwilling to be thus inconveniently drawn aside from the general review of the present system of Societies, before it is completed, into the defence of particular portions of it, we will on the present occasion gratify him with a reply.

First and foremost, we disclaim the most distant intention of offering a personal insult to the writer. We are at a loss, indeed, to conceive upon what grounds he has arrived at this conclusion. It is possible that he may consider the rendering of the very long name he has adopted, by a shorter orientalism, in this point of view. If this be the case: and he regards our innocent pleasure in the light of an insult, we at once retract the translation. Our business is with measures, rather than with men; and with men who sustain the present system of Societies, rather than with those who are maintained by it.

The writer assumes that, in our former reply, we acknowledged the justice of his charges. He is, of course, at liberty to draw his own inferences; but we neither recognized the justice of them on that occasion, nor do we now. We may have drawn the picture of a vicious system in colours, but we contend that it is a faithful likeness.

In allusion to the quotation from the Leicester Mercury, we think the writer has not fairly stated the case. We remarked that the sentiments which we expressed were beginning to gain ground in England, and that they were clothed in language more severe than any we had used. To substantiate this fact, we adduced the first example which came to hand, without, however, binding ourselves to an approbation of the unqualified terms in which the writer had indulged. It is not fair in the Society's Advocate to assert that we have thus endeavoured to make "other's faults stone for, and cover our own." He will at once see the illogical position of his argument when he remembers, that one of the most violent charges brought against us in his letter, is, that instead of having owned our faults, we had threatened to repeat them.

We yield to none in an ardent devotion to the blessed cause of Christian Missions. The sentiments which we imbibed from the great men who have rendered Serampore sacred in the eyes of the Christian world, have experienced no diminution, and we sincerely trust that our Missionary feelings are as true and warm as those of the Society's Advocates, or any of his friends. It is precisely because, through the degeneracy which time breeds in all institutions, the present system of Societies appears to have become rather an obstacle to the progress of this cause, than an auxiliary to it, that we call for reform. The system is one of human contrivance, and is not only susceptible of improvement, but demands constant, vigilant and faithful revision, to prevent its rapid deterioration. The Roman world was converted to Christianity, without the aid of Societies,—we mean, of great, unwieldy, metropolitan Societies:—though not without the instrumentality of provincial associations acting independently of each other. It is possible, therefore, for Christianity to triumph over idolatry in the present age, without the cumbrous machinery of Exeter Hall. Perhaps we may differ in this opinion from the Advocates of Societies; though there are many points in which we are agreed. We separate the Cause from the Societies, which are intended to advance it, and think that the one may flourish, without the other; he identifies them. We both concur in thinking the Missionary spirit of the age an emanation from the Father of Light; but he seems to claim somewhat of a divine character for the apparatus of Societies, which we cannot admit. He regards them as so sacred a light, that it is sacrilegious to touch them; and the man who exposes their deformities, becomes chargeable with the guilt of "blackening the Societies, whom God has employed in his Providence, as the channel for communicating divine truth to the nations." We consider that the construction, the character, and the tendencies of Societies may be examined and exposed, without blackening a divine instrument. He believes that good has been done through them; so do we; but we go a step farther, and consider that now they have lost the holy simplicity of their original character, and assumed a secular organization, much more good might be done without them.

The writer is altogether at fault when he states, that "hostility burns deeply in our hearts against religious societies, and that we are throwing obstacles in the way of their progressive usefulness." So far is this from being the case, that we wish Societies could be multiplied tenfold. We wish Societies,—not Auxiliary Societies.—to spread throughout our native land; and are firmly convinced that nothing short of this will counteract that spirit of metropolitan assumption and arrogance, which has followed the acquisition of religious power in London, and which not only obstructs the progress of usefulness of Societies, but threatens, at no distant period, to extinguish the cause. It is against the unwieldy religious bodies which have grown up in London, and which will, we account, suffer bodies independent of them to be established in the provinces, that we raise our voice. It was this system of unwise centralization, with its long train of evils, that Carey, Marshman and Ward; Hall, Foster and Fuller, the great luminaries of the Baptist denomination in the present age, so constantly deplored. It is this which we wish to see corrected.

In consequence of this monopoly of all power and influence in London, a vast machinery has gradually been constructed, in the management of which the spirit of the Missionary cause is deteriorated, and runs every risk of becoming eventually extinct. The means absorb that attention, and attract to themselves those feelings of attachment which ought to belong exclusively to the end. The support of the Society becomes the primary object; that of the Cause becomes one of secondary importance. We do not say that this is actually and universally the case; but the London system is rapidly bringing matters to this pass. Inferior interests have already been largely mingled up with the great interest which called Societies into existence; and they are insidiously gaining the ascendancy, and thus rendering reform difficult. We said that the evils, of which we complained, were inseparable from this system of great Societies; and any man may verify this assertion who will look into their mechanism. The affairs of these bodies are managed by an oligarchy, endowed with the dispensation of large sums, and the distribution of an extensive patronage. The few who form the interior cabinet of the large Societies, enjoy vast power. Through their affiliated Societies, they have acquired a paramount influence in the country; and by means of their salaried agents, they wield that influence at will. They monopolize the organs of public intelligence, so that nothing can reach the public ear, but with their permission; thus they enjoy a virtual irresponsibility. They have made a territorial division of the heathen world among themselves, with the view, doubtless, of preventing collision among their Missionaries; but the division serves all the purposes of consolidating and perpetuating their power, by making it their common interest to keep out interlopers. This vast machinery of power, influence and patronage, is, moreover, invested with a sacred character, which enables those who direct it, to keep down opposition, on the plausible ground that to assail it can arise only from an impious desire to destroy the instrument appointed of God for the conversion of the heathen. Having grown to so large a size, and being in possession of incomes, which, however enormous, are always anticipated by their expenditure, they are obliged to use the most strenuous efforts to maintain their pecuniary position; and these efforts are not always in scrupulous accordance with the sacredness of the object. With all these elements of despotism combined in one system, if there should not be a rapid deterioration of these bodies, and a glaring departure from their pristine simplicity of aim, it would be a miracle. We are anxious that the supporters of Societies at home,—and it is to them we address ourselves,—should look into these evils before they have aroused public indignation, and produced that re-action of public feeling which will prostrate all Societies in the dust. We desire, therefore, the religious and missionary independence of the Provinces; we wish to see a nucleus of religious and missionary zeal established in every division of the country. We wish the cause of Missions to be carried forward upon the permanent principles of Christian duty, instead of being maintained by the wavering feelings of religious excitement.—But we must not anticipate our future articles. Such being our object, we are not bound to take up the case individually of each Society, as the Advocates demands of us. We object to the present system, of which the beneficial principles have more or less admitted all religious bodies. We call upon them, now that we are approaching the close of the first half century of modern Missions, to compare the comparative insignificance of the result with the greatness of the means which have been created for the work; to ascertain what obstacles to success are to be found in the vicious organization of the Societies themselves, and to remove them with an unsparring hand.

We thank our friend who considers the patronage of a Society a badge of honour for his motto. "Few have seemed prepared to mend what they find amiss, or vigorously to help what they cannot mend." We shall cheerfully avail ourselves of it when we come to the more respectable portion of our subject, and treat of the means, after having established the necessity of reform.

The writer is evidently young and inexperienced in controversy, and will, therefore, excuse our giving him one piece of advice, never to question motives. Few things are more vulgar, because nothing is more easy. He states that our motive in publishing the Reports of the Societies was mercenary. How easy would it be for us to retort the charge on him; and to affirm that in endeavouring to write up Societies, by one of which he is supported, he is but writing for his own bread. But such insinuations would do little credit to our character, and abstract much from the strength of our argument. We believe the writer defends with zeal, what he conscientiously, though in our opinion, erroneously, believes to be a sound system. Our motives are as disinterested as his; and should meet with equal consideration.

THE CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.—Our contemporary has inadvertently done us an injury, in reference to the immolations which took place at Runjeet Sing's funeral. He supposes that it was in reference to these deplorable sacrifices that we described the scene as one which carried the mind back to the feudal times. If he will peruse our remarks, he will perceive that we referred only to the death-bed scene of the men who had raised himself by violence from an obscure post to supreme power. And when we contemplated his weak and emaciated form lying in the agonies of death; and remorse of conscience for many a deed of injustice and blood, urging him to deeds of atonement; the hungry priests surrounding his couch, and the vast sums lavished upon them, and upon the most renowned shrines in India, by way of victim, the imagination was irresistibly carried back to former days, and to similar scenes, though on a smaller scale, in our own land, to which many a religious House owed its rich patrimony. The immolation of the victims was a deed of unalloyed horror; and cannot be contemplated without feelings of the deepest disgust.

PERTAS CHAND.—As our readers may take some interest in the fortunes of this impostor, which have now fallen into the sea and yellow leaf, we have republished the very conclusive reasons given by the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut for refusing a new trial.

WEEKLY EPIITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 1.

The Kilmany Steamer, the pig ship as we have named her here, which the Company have sent out round the Cape, brings news from that colony, that a large steamer, called the India, had been launched in the Clyde, destined to ply between London and Cape Town.—We had almost forgotten to mention that the Kilmany has been cleaned out, and rechristened by the Directors, the Zenobia; and is now a grand war steamer on the Indian station.—Affairs are in a very inexplicable state in Persia, as, indeed, they seem to be almost all over the world. The Governor of Bushire who insulted the Admiral, has next day they grow, like the man who bid higher for the post, placed in his stead. Then it is said, that the King, on hearing how valiantly the Governor had beaten off a 74 from the town, sent him and his brother officers titles of honour, dresses of honour, and jewels. In the same breath almost, we are told that he sent a messenger to recall the messenger who was bringing these good things. One day we hear that he has started for Herat with 40,000 men; the next day they grow, like Mr. Taylor's Resurrection men, into 70,000; the next news that arrives is, that he has not set out; and has neither will nor power to move; and anon, whereas of a grand quarrel with him and the Count Duhann, who was sent to replace Simonich. The quarrel is, of course, fudge, for the Russians do not take offence, contrary to their own interests. Be that as it may; the John Adam which lately sailed from hence with an incredibly valuable cargo of twenty lakhs of Rupees, has not ventured into the troubled waters of Bushire, but placed herself under the protection of the British flag at Karachi.—An extraordinary rise of the Tigris and Euphrates has lately carried away that ill-fated city, Bagdad. Twenty thousand men have been employed, night and day, in damming the water, which for a whole month, (so says the letter,) has been lying all round the walls at a level with the roofs of most of the houses inside. Frightful—Three more wrecks to the Eastward. The Steam, off Java head, the Aligie, in Torres Straits; and the Oronde, in the neighbourhood. No lives are reported as having been lost, but much property.—The Court of Directors have sent out permission to all their servants of the Civil and Military Services to become shareholders in Societies, but prohibits their taking any part in the management of them.—The Sikhs, who were pursuing their way from Peshawar to Cabul, no sooner heard of the death of Runjeet Singh, than they deserted the expedition to return into the Punjab, and left Colonel Wade in the lurch, in the Khyber Pass, to fight his own battle with Dost Mahomed.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 2.

A rumour is given in the Englishman, that Shere Singh, a younger and chier son of the late Runjeet, than his brother, has been murdered; and that Rajah Dieren Singh is suspected of the foul deed. It wants confirmation.—It is confidently stated that the Court of Directors have disapproved of the Oude Auxiliary Force, and ordered it to be disbanded, and some sum of sixteen lakhs of Rupees to be refunded; and letters talk of a royal salute on the occasion. There is so much of buster in the narrative, that it is difficult to distinguish humour from fact. We wish all the correspondents of newspapers could be brought to perceive, that the first object of writing, is to be clearly understood.—Letters from Necmuh give the detail of the force, foot, horse and artillery, which is to move against Joudipore in the cold weather. There is, however, little likelihood of a brush with Muan Sing. As soon as he sees the British Lion shake his mane in earnest, and prepare for the struggle, he will become as quiet as a lamb.—Monsieur Dupuis's case against Lieut. Harvey is reported in the papers. At a fancy ball giving by Monsieur Dupuis, Lieut. Harvey made him a low French bow, which brought his head in contact with the pit of M. Dupuis's stomach, and Lieut. Harvey then urged M. Dupuis to the edge of the staircase. Lieut. Harvey's defence was, that after having brought his head upon a level with the stomach, some of his friends urged it into the dancing master, by a violent impulse from behind. The Magistrate fined Lieut. Harvey 25 Rs., but is reported to have pursued the very extraordinary course of censuring M. Dupuis's giving a ball! It well the Magistrate has not the Examiner to deal with.—The late letters from the Persian Gulf state, that a regular monthly post has been established for some time between Busorah and Beyroot, and that the journey is made in eighteen days.—News from China has been received to the beginning of June, for which we refer to our editorial notice. Of the 20,288 chests of Opium delivered up, more than 7,000 were under the charge of one house, that of Jardine, Matheson, and Co.; 5,845 belonged to Parsee merchants, and the remainder to twenty-four houses, whose shares vary from two chests and a half to seventeen hundred.—The following gentlemen of the Civil Service retire upon the annuity of this year: Messrs. M. H. Turnbull, W. Crocroft, W. Braddon, Archibald Trotter, H. T. Prinsep, and F. G. Smith.—Captain Bogle, the Superintendent of Arracan, has suddenly returned to Calcutta from thence, in the Steamer Ganges. This looks ominous of a war with Tharrawaddie, says the Englishman; it does not, says the Courier. The Herakhs says, that, according to letters from Rangoon, Tharrawaddie was collecting all his resources for the struggle with us, and that war was inevitable.—Our Chief Justice will proceed in a few days to Simlah, where he intends to pass several months.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 3.

Mr. W. Dampier, it is said, will succeed Mr. F. C. Smith, as Superintendent of Police.—Dr. Martin is about to resign the post of Surgeon of the Native Hospital, and there will, probably, be a sharp contest for it. Drs. Balch, Chapman and Stewart are the candidates now in the field.—Major Thurbury succeeds Major Ross in the management of affairs in Jeypora, where matters have reached a point of disorganization, beyond which lies the dissolution of society. The late Ministers have noted like the Oriental Ministers; they have freed the people and filled their own coffers. Such things passed daily without notice under the Mahomedans.

Government. They are rare since our standard has ruled the country, and hence the surprise expressed in the papers.—The troops had not started from Candahar on the 23d June.—Letters from Allahabad state that the 68th Regiment, which is a volunteer corps, has been ordered to Barrackpore. Their destination cannot but be Arson. This looks warlike.—The Englishman has begun to give the tone of the sentence of the Press at Meerabad. It is, unfortunately, to come out in dribsles. As yet the only offence appears to have been that of having established a Press without giving notice; but why was the offence overlooked till now?—The first part of Orders and Regulations of the Bengal Army, with which every officer, from the General to the Cadet, ought to be fully acquainted, has just been published. It extends to the letter D. It occupies five hundred pages. The whole of this Cadet's Vade Mecum will extend to two thousand closely printed pages, in a small type, and no exuberance of margin. Surely the English are the most law-ridden people under the sun. Law Civil, Law Military, Law Ecclesiastical: It is the same gross, unseemly, unwieldy levianthan in every department of duty.

MONDAY, AUGUST 5.

The preparations which Government is making, appear to portend some important measures in the approaching cold weather. The Englishman of this morning states, that not only the 68th, but all the marine, or volunteer corps, the 25th, 40th, 47th, 66th, 67th, and 68th are ordered to proceed to Barrackpore, so as to arrive there by the end of October. This looks sufficiently warlike. There could be no reason for congregating the corps, who are enlisted for foreign, as well as domestic service, at Barrackpore, if Tharwaddee were not in the Governor General's eye.—A general augmentation of the existing army of India, at all the Presidencies, of one additional Company, or one hundred rank and file, with fourteen Native Officers and two drummers, has just been ordered. This at once gives an additional strength of nearly eighteen thousand men to the army; equal to that of nearly twenty additional regiments. By adopting this mode of augmentation, Government saves the expense of additional officers. But it is a penny wise and pound foolish arrangement. The experiment with how small a portion of European soul and spirit it is possible to keep up the efficiency of an army in time of war, has now been carried to the utmost stretch; but it appears that Government requires a proof of failure, before it applies a remedy. The orders for embodying the new European Regiments are out. Thirty-nine officers to nine hundred and twenty non-commissioned and rank and file; nearly double the strength of the Native corps.—The Singapore Free Press has a long article on the progress of the Dutch in the subjugation of the Island of Sumatra, the most important part of which we have transferred to our columns. They intend to allow no rival power in the island, and to make it a second Java. In ten years they have made more progress in the conquest of the island than we did in two centuries; but than it must be so confessed that they are not quite so scrupulous about the rights of independent nations as we are, and do not consider their own Grotius as law, in all cases of intercourse between the civilized and the savage world.—The Bombay papers state that 11,695 chests of Opium are now in store at that Presidency! We regret to learn that Sir James Carnarvon has experienced a return of the complaint in the eyes which he felt during his former residence in India, and has been sent by his physicians to Poona.—The territory of Upper Assam, which has been made made over in Poorender Sing, and in which he has been practicing Oriental despotism in all its diversified forms, having been resumed by the British Government, and annexed to the British empire, is placed under the control of the Local Government of Bengal.—Accounts from the Indigo Estates in Rangoon, Dinnagore, Myinging, Bagoorah, Malde and Rajshahy, are dismal. The river has ruined them.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 6.

At the auction sale of freight for the Steamer on Saturday last, the price rose to the incredible sum, of five Rupees the cubic foot, at which rate it is understood twelve or fourteen hundred feet were disposed of.—The Maurician informs its readers, that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to introduce a Bill into Parliament, to allow the emigration of Indian labourers into the Mauritius; they being allowed gods and priests, and being guarded by protectors; who have been found so eminently serviceable at Jamaica, as to oblige the Ministers to suspend its consideration. Where sleeps the Report of the Cooey Committee?—Letters from beyond the Indus state, that the report of the Persians having marched to Herat is totally unfounded, and this is confirmed by news from the Persian Gulf. It is also mentioned that Dost Mahomed has lost the confidence of his people, and cannot oppose us; some letters go so far as to say, that he has agreed to a pension of 600 Rs. a month. The Army of the Indus was to move on the 25th, but the day will, doubtless, be again postponed. Letters from the Camp allude to a serious misunderstanding between Mr. Monaghan and Sir John Keane; also that the latter had required the officers to declare individually that they were not the authors of certain letters which have appeared in the papers, in which Sir John Keane's generalship and talents are ranked low. Sir John had better raise his reputation by marching on Cabul, than by lingering at Candahar squabbling with his officers.—An attempt, says the Herakur, was made to destroy the Arsenal in Fort William. A barrel of tow and tar was placed under the staircase, and set fire to.—The Court of Sudder Nizamut has finally closed all proceedings in the case of the dis-sent Pertab Chand. After he had failed to get an order for a new trial, he demanded of the Court to know by what law, Mahomedan and British, he was condemned; the application was rejected, and an intimation given, that no application in future under the name of Pertab Chand would be received. It is singular that after the Court had decided that he was an impostor, and had no right to the name of Pertab Chand, they should have received a letter from him, in that character, and replied to it.—We are happy to learn that the Western Provinces have been blessed with copious showers, and that the fears of a famine, which were at one time entertained, have vanished.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

PETITION.

At a Court of Nizamut Adawlat held at the Presidency, under date the 1st July, 1896.

Present.—W. Braddon and C. Tucker, Esqrs., Judges.

Read a petition presented by Alukhal alias Partab Chand, alias Khatolal Fauree Brubumachar, praying that the Court will review or set aside, or suspend so much of their sentence of the 18th ultimo, as relates to the question of the petitioner's identity, and to grant a new or further trial of so much of the said sentence as relates to the said question, upon the grounds set forth in his petition; which are briefly as follows:—

1st. That the conviction of the Court debars the petitioner from prosecuting in the Civil Court for the recovery of his rights.

2dly. That on the point of identity the petitioner has had nothing approaching to a fair, complete, and satisfactory trial, in as much as a variety of heterogeneous charges having been preferred against him, his advisers, were distracted by their number, and devoted their attention to such part of them only as appeared to involve actuality. That his legal advisers not conceiving that the charge of personation could ever amount to a tangible crime, confined themselves to adducing just so much evidence as was sufficient to throw a doubt upon the question of identity, reserving the most material evidence on that point until the contemplated civil trial should take place. And further, in as much as several witnesses for the attendance of whom application was duly made to the Magistrate were not produced because the perwannahs issued contained no penalty for non-attendance, nor was any process of Court issued to enforce their attendance, whilst that of witnesses for the prosecution was enforced by attachment and seizure of their property.

2. On the first point the Court do not consider it necessary to enter into any discussion as to whether the petitioner's statement be correct in law or not. They observe that the fact established against the petitioner, having been declared to involve an offence punishable under the law which they are required to administer, the Court could not proceed to pass upon him a sentence of acquittal, merely because a finding of an opposite character might effect his civil claims.

3. On the second point; the Court find on the record of the trial before the Sessions Judge, in a long and laboured written defence filed on the 27th December, 1838, the following sentences 'I should only say on this subject (the charge of personation) that so satisfied were my legal advisers of the small chance which I had of obtaining justice in the Magistrate's Court, that they advised me to reserve my defence for this Court. Here I mean to set it up. Here I mean to show by clear and undoubted testimony that I am no impostor, but in truth and verity, the remainder of Burdwan.' This sentence would seem to disprove the assertion, supposing it to be one entitled to consideration, that the petitioner considered the charge of personation to be of no moment, and voluntarily abstained from opposing the evidence adduced on the part of the prosecution in support of it. The Court cannot for a moment suppose that the petitioner's advisers were not fully aware of the importance of rebutting this part of the charge, if possible; indeed, it was urged on the part of the petitioner that unless the charge of personation could have been established the whole of the charges fall to the ground, as every other part of them is set forth as done in furtherance thereof. This is stated by the petitioner in the same defence, in the very outset of which he says, 'the only charge that the malice of my enemies, and the ingenuity of the Government Officer, the Magistrate of Hooghly, have been able to bring against me, amounts to nothing more, if made out, than a misdemeanor, while it is not attempted to be concealed, that this charge, brought and supported by the official influence and extra official labours of the Government Functionary, the Magistrate of Hooghly was merely intended to be subsidiary to that which has all along been admitted to be the chief object of this prosecution, viz., to try in this criminal proceeding a mere civil right; in fact, to prove that I had no right to the Gaddie of Burdwan.'

4. Again with regard to the witnesses summoned by the petitioner, the Court find the following circumstances recorded on the proceedings of the Sessions Judge.

1st. An application from the petitioner filed 5th December, 1838, consenting to withdraw a previous application for the attendance of nine European gentleman witnesses.

2dly. Two applications filed 31st and 30th December, 1838, requesting the Court to suspend proceedings for a few days to give his counsel time to consult and decide whether it would or would not be necessary to call all the witnesses cited to prove the petitioner's identity, as he was in hopes after such consultation, he would be enabled to dispense with the attendance of many of them.

3d. An application to the Sessions Court filed 3d January, 1839, stating his readiness to go into the whole case of his identity, and produce the whole of the evidence in support thereof, provided he were assured that in the event of his proving himself to be the veritable Rajah Periah Chund, the Government would acknowledge him as such, and put him in possession of the honours and rights appertaining to the Rajah of Burdwan. If not he will not bring forward the whole of his evidence, but confine himself to the examination of only a few more witnesses on the question of identity.

4th. An application to the Sessions Court filed 5th January, 1839, setting forth amongst other things. 'That your petitioner has now selected from the very large number of witnesses subpoenaed for the defence the names of several Europeans, as well as Natives of credit and respectability; that these witnesses have given their depositions on oath in your Court, and have declared their full conviction of my identity as the true Rajah Periah Chund.' The petitioner goes on to state, that he had many more witnesses who would appear in the same effect, but that he was 'unwilling to occupy the time of the Court to an almost indefinite period.'

In conclusion, to the petitioner declines enforcing the attendance of the Rannees and Traven Babes.

5th. An application to the Sessions Court filed 11th January, 1839, soliciting the early judgment of the Court, notwithstanding the absence of several witnesses, as he had not the means of compelling their attendance.

5. With reference to the foregoing remarks it is clear to the Court that the petitioner not only knew in what consisted the strength of the charges against him, but that he prepared himself to meet, and further, that he himself on 11th January, 1839, called for the Judgment of the Court.

6. The Court further observe, that since the trial was removed to this Court, the petitioner presented two petitions to the Court, one on the 8th March, the other on the 18th April last, the former of which is to deprecate delay and urge the Court to an early decision; in neither of these, nor in a long statement filed on the 26th of April last, did the petitioner urge any further enquiry but the plea of insufficient investigation as to his identity in the Lower Court.

7. The Court consider that on the petitioner's own showing, there are no grounds for a new trial; in addition to which they are satisfied of the act of the death of the late Rajah Periah Chunder and the burning of his body, as established by the evidence on the trial. They therefore see no grounds whatever for complying with the petitioner's application for a new trial, which is ordered to be rejected accordingly.

EMIGRATION OF INDIAN LABOURERS.

His Excellency the Governor communicated, on Monday last, to the Members of the Legislative Council a ministerial dispatch, announcing the intention of Government shortly to introduce into Parliament a Bill authorizing the emigration of Indian labourers. This bill was in its history in every respect the same as the one presented last session under the title of the 'Native of India Protection Bill,' and which was withdrawn by Ministers in consequence of the objections made to several of its clauses, but with the understanding that a measure of a similar nature would be proposed by them early in the ensuing session. The principal provisions of the intended Bill are the limitation of the period of engagements to five years, the enforcing due respect to the customs and religion of the natives, and the appointment of protectors; and the Secretary of State for the Colonies in his dispatch to the Governor expresses his opinion that the Bill will pass without any modification. On the other hand, we have been assured that private communications have been received from India, from which it would appear that the Supreme Government of that country was equally disposed with the Colonial Department to remove the interdiction on emigration; we may, therefore, consider the permission to introduce Indian labourers as a measure virtually decided on. Our conviction that this would be the case has been expressed in several of our recent numbers, and we are upon more than one account gratified at the speedy fulfilment of our predictions.—Le Mauritien, June 13.

PROGRESS OF THE DUTCH IN SUMATRA.

There seems little doubt that the Dutch are now hastening with rapid strides to the subjugation of the whole island of Sumatra. While they are obtaining easy possession of the ports on the West Coast, to the northward of Tapanooly, the resistance of the native tribes in the interior, whose opposition was formerly so fierce, appears to have ceased. On the East Coast, in the course of last year, they formed an establishment at Indragiri, on the large river of that name—Deliki is also menaced with a visit from them, the Rajah of that territory having recently given notice to the Sultana Government of their expected approach across the country from Singkel, and having represented that, without the interposition of the English, he would be compelled to submit to whatever terms they might think fit to impose. Once established at Deliki, it only remains for them to take post on the large rivers which lie between that and Indragiri in order to give them the command of all eastern side of the island below Deliki, which does not already own their supremacy, while they are already in possession of the opposite coast as far north as Singkel. The latter place, as well as Dulki, was formerly a dependency of Acheen; and there seems little doubt that the remainder of the country on both coasts, to the northward, comprising the dismembered fragments of the old Acheen monarchy, is destined to share the same fate as the rest of the island—understanding that the Dutch pledged themselves in 1824, that they would regulate their relations with Acheen in such a manner that, while the exercise of their influence should contribute to commercial security, that State should 'lose nothing of its Independence.' In the arrangements which they are making for the administration of those portions of the island which they have mastered by force of arms, the Dutch shew that they consider themselves established on a footing of permanency and security. Padang is to be annexed to Palembang, to form one residency, and the communication is to be opened through the interior as to connect Padang and Benecool with the large navigable rivers of Palembang and Jambi. These fine streams and that of Indragiri are thus, we suppose, intended to be the outlet for all the valuable produce of that portion of the island, so that commerce would flow through the channels pointed out by nature, while Padang and Benecool would be come mere military stations to preserve the command of these rivers. But, whether this be the intention or not, there seems every prospect of our seeing Dutch supremacy established within a very short period throughout the whole island from Acheen Head to the Straits of Sunda—comprising a country which, according to the best accounts, possesses a population of about four millions, which is more than twice the size of Java, in many places of equal fertility, and infinitely superior to it in the number and extent of its navigable rivers—and which, according to Basile, might have been made more valuable to England than even Java itself, and rendered capable of affording in a few years employment to as much British tonnage as were engaged in the West India trade in its best and brightest days!—Singapore Free Press, June 20.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES, ENGLISH AND SANSKRIT.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—There appeared in your paper several years ago, an article on the theory of education, as it appeared to you it ought to be conducted in the Government Schools; and you then, if I recollect right, dismissed at some length the propriety of introducing, not Christianity, which you seemed to think should be brought forward there, but a course of instruction in Natural Theology and Morals. This was a valuable and important thought; and one which would have borne reiteration from time to time, or the further development, which your further reflection might have given to the original germ. Whether Natural Theology is taught at all in the Government Schools, I am not aware; but if the charges which are continually alleged against the Hindoo College, of turning out its pupils in an atheistic state of belief, have any truth, (and the respectable quarter from which they proceed, prevents the supposition that they are unfounded); they seem to prove that sufficient pains are not taken to imbue the students with sound principles on this momentous subject. Such doctrine as you suggested should be taught, could not be otherwise than of a neutral character; since though they are nowheres inculcated by Hindoos in their pure form, they are so consistent with reason, that the votaries of the Shastras could not object to their propagation.

2. To what extent illumination is permitted to penetrate into the Government Sanskrit Colleges, does not appear very clearly; as the Reports of the General Committee of Public Instruction do not dilate on the subject of these classical schools. It appears from Bishop Heber's Journal, quoted at page 58 of Mr. Trevelyan's recent work on Indian Education, that the Ptolemaic, or Sidiotic Astronomy, (and not the Pauranic fables on that subject,) is taught at the Benares College; and I understand that a Professor of the Siddhantas has lately been selected for the Poona Sanskrit College; and, probably, the same may be the case in the Calcutta College. This is all, however, I fear that has latterly been done to put the Sanskrit students on the road to true science, and enlightening, and ameliorating information. From the caustic review of Mr. Trevelyan's brochure, which appeared in the London Asiatic Journal, for August last, (which you have attributed, with manifest error, to Dr. H. H. Wilson,) it is evident that the case was otherwise in the palmy days of the Sanskrit College, when its students were taught English, and instructed in the sciences of medicine. It is much to be regretted that while the Government maintain Sanskrit Colleges at Calcutta, Benares, Agra, Delhi and Poona, no effort should have been made for so great a length of time to render them instrumental in communicating, by gradual steps, and in a judicious and skilful manner, the elements of a sounder knowledge than the Shastras can teach. It appeared from a quotation made not long ago in the Friend of India, or Sansarhar Darpan, from one of the Native Newspapers, that some measure (it did not very clearly appear what,) had been adopted in the Calcutta College for the better instruction of the students of Sanskrit. It is devoutly to be hoped that this may be true, and that some effectual steps may have been taken to divert the energies of the pupils into useful channels. The Education Committee do not scruple to permit the young men at the Hindoo College to be thoroughly indoctrinated in genuine science; and why should any hesitation be felt in regard to pursuing the same course with those youths of the same religion, who are studying the classical language of their own country?

3. The most effectual mode of attaining this end would, no doubt, be, the one which was formerly in force in the time of Dr. Wilson, viz., to make the young men learn the English language, together with the Sanskrit; but as, if I mistake not, the English class attached to the Sanskrit College was abandoned, in compliance with Native prejudice,* another practicable course presents itself in the use of Sanskrit compilations, prepared with a view to communicate such information as we may desire to afford. One advantage of this would be its openness; as the Pandits, who are, doubtless, the origin and centre of Hindoo feeling on the subject of their religion, would know precisely what the pupils were taught, by a perusal of those manuals; whereas they would be ignorant (many of them, at least,) of the precise contents of the English books which would otherwise be put into the hands of the students. Another advantage would be, that thus proofs and illustrations could be occasionally adduced from the Shastras, countenancing, to a certain extent, the new facts or principles of which a knowledge was communicated. This is a subject which requires no illustration; but yet an interesting instance or two may be given, in addition to those adduced by Mr. Wilkinson, from the Siddhantas. Notwithstanding the darkness of Indian history, a few struggling rays of light can be obtained from the Shastras to illustrate the power and genius of the Greeks. In the Mahabharata (Karna Parva, sect. 45) they are thus mentioned: सर्वत्र यन्ना द्रुपदोऽपि विद्वान्

"The Yavanas are all-knowing and especially heretic."† And again, in the Sabha Parva, sect. 13, the Greek monarch is mentioned as one of the allies of Jarasandha. यवश्च यवनेश्च वा वि देव यवानां च यवनेश्च वा यवा यवानां च यवनेश्च वा "And the Yavana monarch, of invincible might, who, like Varaha rules Maru and Naraka in the west." A Yavanadhipa is said also to have been among the sultors at the Svayamvara, of Draupadi. Varaha Mihira, too, a Hindoo Astronomer, quoted by Mr. Colebrooke in his Essay on the Procession of the Equinoxes, (see his Essays, vol. 2, page 410) speaks thus of the Greeks: यवश्च वि यवनेश्च यवश्च यवनेश्च विद्वान् "And the Yavanas are all-knowing and especially heretic." Among them this Shastra is well established. They are revered as Rishis: How much more a Brahman skilled in astrology." It must be evident how quotations of this kind would confirm, in native estimation, our novel historical facts. The evidence of Varaha Mihira appeared quite superfluous to a Pandit to whom the slokas from the Mahabharata were shown. "Vyajñesi himself has said it is so; then what more evidence can be required?" From the considerable sum bestowed in prizes on the Sanskrit students at the recent examination, and from the appointment of Capt. Marshall to the Secretaryship, it would seem to be the desire of the Committee to improve the College. It is only to be hoped that some effectual steps will be adopted for this end. Commending this subject to your care,

I remain, yours faithfully,

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—As the question whether Clauses 2 and 3 of Section 24, Regulation VII. of 1822, can be acted upon by the Unconsecrated Deputy Collectors, in discharging the public duties with which they are entrusted, has very recently been started, with a negative proposition as unsound, as it is derogatory and unseemly to these public functionaries, and which is very likely to operate in a serious manner in retarding the progress of the settlement operations; will you, Mr. Editor, be good enough to favour us with your views on the subject. As there is no other Remission Law or Rule for the guidance of the Unconsecrated Branch of the Service, are the Deputy Collectors empowered, or not, to act under the provisions of those which are alone in force at present, until some separate rule be enacted exclusively for the Unconsecrated Remission Officers?

Should you deem this important question worthy of a place in your columns, pray be good enough to insert it, coupled with your opinion as collected.

I remain, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Srd August, 1886.

Our opinion would not be law; but the Deputy Collector may at once have his doubt solved by an application to the Commissioner.—Ed.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANBERRIA.—The House of Lords, on Thursday, Lord Brougham delivered the judicial opinion on the famous "Austerlander" case. He went over all the facts at great length, and briefly stated the main point at issue. The Earl of Kinross had presented a Mr. R. Young to a living of which he was the patron; but the Presbytery of Austerlander had refused to ordain and induct him to the living, conceiving that with the authority of the heads of the families of Austerlander it had a right to exercise a veto, or to dissent from the presentment made by the patron. "The question was, whether the Presbytery had a right to reject a presentment made by lawful authority. The Court of Session had decided that the Presbytery of Austerlander had not this right, and that the Earl of Kinross should be allowed to exercise his power of presentment to the living. It was against this decision that the Presbytery of Austerlander now appealed. Lord Brougham said, that having given the fullest consideration to all the circumstances, and having anxiously investigated all the statutes which bore upon the question, he had come to the conclusion—and he came to it without the least doubt—that the Court below had given a right decision, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed. On Friday, the Lord Chancellor Cottonham gave a similar and final judgment. Thus settles the famous "independence" of this State Church of Scotland.—Christ. Adv.

THE CONVERSION OF SAINTS.—We shall be glad at some future time to enter into the scriptural doctrine of the visible unity of believers on earth; to meet every objection brought forward by enquiring minds, and to labour to show the fallacy and sophistry of the position held by many against it. At present we desire rather to call attention to the incontrovertible fact—and facts are stubborn things—that the Holy Spirit, in every part of the world, bringing a people prepared, and having assumedly investigated all the statutes which bore upon the question, he had come to the conclusion—and he came to it without the least doubt—that the Court below had given a right decision, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed. On Friday, the Lord Chancellor Cottonham gave a similar and final judgment. Thus settles the famous "independence" of this State Church of Scotland.—Christ. Adv.

same object sought after by many from various quarters, without any connexion. We have seen many clergymen of the Church of England leave their position on this plan. Within the last eight years, no fewer perhaps than thirty. Some from the Society of Friends are seeking the same. In other places, we find "a Baptist minister," renouncing baptism on a plea; and in others, "a Wesleyan minister," and in others, ministers from among the Independents, Presbyterians, &c.—Inquirer.

MALAGASY CONVERTS.—It was mentioned by Mr. Bismarck at his chapel last evening, 28th April, that there were in the Channel Islands Christians who had fled from persecution in their native country, Madagascar; one of whom is the individual (Rafarany) who was by mistake said to have suffered death last year. It is hoped that they will arrive in London in time to be present at the annual meeting of the London Missionary Society.—Christ. Adv.

ANOTHER COLONIAL BISHOP.—At the meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, on Friday last, it was announced that the Government had agreed to appoint a Bishop for Newfoundland and Bermuda, in the place of the two Archbishops of those islands. The Archbishop of Newfoundland is at present vacant; and it is understood that Dr. Spencer, the Archbishop of Bermuda, (brother of the present Bishop of Madras,) will be nominated to this new See. The allowance from Government will be the same as that granted to the two Archbishops, which amounted together to 7000. per annum, and the Society have agreed for the present to vote 5000. per annum in addition. The appointment of Dr. Spencer will give universal satisfaction.—Social Gazette.

NEW CHURCHES IN IRELAND.—From the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland for 1886, it appears that "Sixty-three churches have been or are being rebuilt, and thirteen enlarged, by means of funds provided by the commissioners, with the aid of local subscriptions, and forty by funds provided by the late board of first-fruits. Of the sum of 40,000. set apart for church works in the present year, 20,070. 6s. 6d. have been appropriated to rebuilding and enlargement, in addition to a sum of 2,502. 10s. 3d., received from private subscriptions, and 28,127. 14s. 6d. to repairs." The commissioners appear to have expended in the year for building, rebuilding, or repairing churches and glebe-houses, 60,551. 2s.—Christ. Adv.

MODERATORSHIP OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—The gentlemen intended to be proposed for this high office is the Rev. Dr. Henry Duncan, minister of Ruthwell, the distinguished originator of "savings" banks, and author of the "Philosophy of the Sinner."—Ibid.

RESTORED ROMAN CATHOLICS.—A letter from POSEN of the 10th inst., quoted by the Leipzig Gazette, mentions the discovery of a secret association of Catholics in that part of Polish Prussia for the reformation of the Catholic religion; the object proposed being to found a church similar to the Albo Claret, in Paris.—Ibid.

BIRMINGHAM.—A new Catholic church is about to be erected in Birmingham, on or very near the site of the chapel in Shadwell-street, built about thirty years ago. The estimated cost of the building is 10,000., of which 8,500. is stated to have been subscribed.—Ibid.

CENTENARY COMMEMORATION OF THE ITINERANT MINISTRY OF THE REV. G. WHITEFIELD.—The Committee of the Christian Instruction Society have made arrangements for holding a meeting at the Tabernacle, Moorfields, on Whit-Tuesday next, May 21st, to commemorate the centenary of the first efforts of Whitefield to preach in the fields and streets of the metropolis "the unspeakable riches of Christ."—Pat.

PRUSA.—The Prussian Government has, it appears, ordered judicial proceedings to be instituted against another Catholic priest, the Bishop of Culm, because of his having, in violation of his colleagues of Cologne and Posen, published a pastoral letter, enjoining his clergy to enforce rigorously in all cases of mixed marriages, with the regulations established in that respect by the council and the Sovereign Pontiff.—Ibid.

SINGULAR EFFORT OF MEMORY.—At a meeting of the Bethnagar Ladies Bible Association, 250 children under 14, from the Sunday-schools in the parish, who had committed the 119th Psalm to memory, were rewarded with a Bible.—Christ. Adv.

DECLINE OF INFANT BAPTISM.—The incumbent of Kew, in Cornwall, has circulated a printed handbill, calling upon parents in the parish to bring their children to be baptised. He tells them that they cannot "neglect the baptism of their children without the most heinous sin," and that "no one who has not received it has any title to salvation." As an inducement, he gives notice that he shall, on Easter and Whit Sunday, be ready to baptise all the children who may be brought to him, with "proper sponsors," during the afternoon service, when, he says, "on those two occasions only, the usual payment to the clerk and sexton will be dispensed with." The penalty for this appeal is attributed to the Registration Act.—Ibid.

ENGLISH ARMY'S SOW.—At the meeting of the West Riding Congregational Home Missionary Society, the Rev. James

Johnson, of Green-Hammerton, stated that the son of Eugene Aron was indirectly the means of his conversion, and of laying the foundation of the church over which he was pastor in Green Hammerton.—Leeds Mercury.

ECCLIASTICAL, RELIGIOUS, AND PHILANTHROPIC STATISTICS OF GUERNSEY.—As we have frequently had inquiries made as to the benevolent institutions and ecclesiastical provisions of the island, we have taken some pains to obtain authentic information. The subject is a summary of the provisions made for the accommodation of the population of St. Peter's for religious worship, and what are the relative proportions for its different denominations:—Episcopalians: Parochial church, 1097 sittings; St. James's church, 1240; St. John's church, 600; Trinity chapel, 686; Bethel chapel, 304.—Wesleyan Methodists: Domesday chapel, 1074; Le Marchant-street chapel, (French,) 308; Wesley chapel, (French and English,) 250.—Independent: Eldon chapel, 708; New-street chapel, (French,) 710; Clifton chapel, 240.—Methodist New Connexion: Zion chapel, 431; Hopkin-lane Preaching Room, (French and English,) 104.—Bible Christians: Salem chapel, 980.—Primitive Methodists: Pollet-street Preaching Room, 304.—Frianes: Clifton Meeting House, 180.—Roman Catholics: Burnt-lane chapel, 290.—Baptists: Preaching Room at the Strand, 200.—Unitarians: Allen-street Preaching Room, 100.—Bethel Union: Preaching Room on the Quay, 900.—Total, 9,738. Here are three churches, twelve chapels, and five meeting rooms, affording accommodation for 9,738 adult individuals out of a population of 13,985, amounting to more than two-thirds of the whole population. In the country parishes, incredible as it may appear, there is an aggregate accommodation for at least 8,500 persons out of a population of 10,488; and, in the ecclesiastical provisions, the following list of the institutions, together with the amounts raised annually in their support, as stated in the present or last year's reports of those institutions, or obtained from their officers, will fully bear out this statement:—Missionary Societies: Church Missionary Society, 4235. 1s. 11d.; Wesleyan, do. 4234. 11s. 4d.; London, do. (Independents), 1906; Methodist New Connexion, do. 651. 17s. 10d.; Bible Christian, do. 311. 1s. 5d.; Primitive Methodist, do. 804. 5s. 7d.; Total, 1,1007. 17s. 1d.—Bible Societies: British and Foreign Bible Society, 4151. 8s. 10d.; Guernsey do. 1084. 16s. 10d.; Trinitarian, do. 171. 4s. To this must be added what is raised by occasional collections and contributions for other smaller societies publishing no report, and for societies in England and Ireland having no Committee or stated Representatives in Guernsey, probably amounting to not less than 5001. When it is remembered that such efforts are made annually, out of a population of 34,000 souls, it cannot indeed be said that Guernsey is a barren or uncultivated waste.—Guernsey Star.

The Guernsey Star, of the 18th inst., brings us a report of a meeting of the "St. Peter's" of the island in the Court House, at which the propriety of adopting the English Marriage and Registration Acts was discussed. Of the members present, seven were rectors; and they conducted in the debate characteristic of a state clergy. The rector of St. Andrew, in opposing the measure, denounced the promoters of these changes as "a combination of Disasters, with Deists, Atheists, Socialists, and Papists;" and said that the Act would lead to a neglect of Baptism, and "paralyze the island!" The rector of St. Pierre du Bois gave a written speech from his pocket, and read a fierce attack on the Act, on the score of its irreligious tendencies; but at the conclusion of his essay, he revealed the secret of the clerical opposition to the measure, by showing, that if it were adopted, a Dissenting wedding would "cost four shillings less" than a wedding at Church, and that therefore a temptation would be held out to Secedents, to conduct their brides past the church-door to the meeting-house! The "Bill" flogged the priests for their assumption that a trumpery saving would lead the whole population to become Dissenters, and reminded them that "they greatly erred in making the Church and Religion convertible terms." But the Church were proof against all appeals, and the Act was repudiated.—Christ. Adv.

EDUCATION.

In reply to Lord Stanley, on the 3d May, Lord John Russell stated that he hoped to bring forward the estimate for education in about six weeks; it would be a separate estimate, containing no items unconnected with education.—Ibid.

At the Lancashire Quarterly Meeting of Friends (Quakers), held in Manchester, the first step was taken towards the establishment of an institution in which their young men may obtain all the benefits of a regular course of education in the higher branches of knowledge. It is probable either Warrington or Farnworth will be selected for the site.—Manchester Tribune.

THE GIPSEY.—It is proposed to found a school for the maintenance and education of the children of the gipsies, in a central part of the kingdom.—Christ. Adv.

KING'S COLLEGE MEDICAL SCHOOL.—It is proposed to establish three scholarships for the medical students of King's College, each of the yearly value of 401., and tenable for three years. Arrangements have been made by the medical professors of the college to provide for two of these scholarships, on condition that means shall be obtained for the permanent endowment of a third.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PRINCESS AUGUSTA OF CAMBRIDGE.—At the Confirmation of the Princess Augusta of Cambridge, at the Chapel Royal, on Saturday week, her Royal Highness (who will attain her 18th year in July next) was simply dressed in white silk, with a long white veil of blonde lace, which she did not raise until the moment of receiving the Archbishop's benediction. Both the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge were much affected, as well as Her Majesty, who was present. Her Majesty looked remarkably well; she wore a pink tulle dress, with a pink bonnet and plume of feathers, a rich Thibet shawl, and the Star of the Garter. On the conclusion of the service the Queen embraced her royal couple, and presented her with a Bible, splendidly bound, in commemoration of the event. The Princess Augusta of Cambridge is to be formally presented to Her Majesty at the first Drawing-room, previously to making her debut in the deux monde. We hear that the Duchess of Cambridge will give a series of balls, for the purpose of introducing her royal daughter. The Queen has determined to commence the state balls with Her Majesty's birth-day in January.—British Gazette.—What a revolting association of solemnity and levity!

THE CITY STATUE OF WELLINGTON.—The final arrangements for this statue have been made with Sir Francis Chantrey. Government has presented to the committee gun metal, the fruits of his Grace's victories, to the value of 1,5001. this added to the sum already subscribed, makes 10,5001. On signing the agreement the sculptor is to receive 5,0001.; 20001. with the metal when the small model is completed; and 4,0001. when the work is finished—which will be on the 18th of June, 1848. The remainder of the sum will be expended in providing a site, and erecting a pedestal of granite three months before the statue is ready. It is to be an equestrian statue in bronze; not less than ten feet high, from the top of the pedestal, on which the horse stands, to the top of the head of the rider. The site is not yet determined upon; but it will be in the vicinity of the Bank.—Pet.

MILITARY FLOGGING.—On Monday last, at Woolwich, George Gough, of the 4th Battalion of the Royal Artillery, for having sold his "kit," received one hundred and fifty lashes. A recruit, unable to bear the sight, rushed from the ranks, to the utter dismay of all around, shouted out, "Are you going to murder the man?" and hastened to the instrument to which the bleeding and mutilated body was securely bolted. A party of non-commissioned officers eventually secured him after receiving some dreadful bites and bruises; and the poor fellow, displaying loathsome sentences of outrage, humanity, and reprehension, was conveyed to the guard-room, and thence to the military hospital, where the medical men promptly attended, and found it expedient to have his head shaved, and every precaution used for the security of his person. If such a scene of horror as this is not sufficient to arrest the attention of those who subvert the system so disgusting and degrading to humanity, they must be led by the hand to public shame.—Christ. Adv.

THE CANADIAN PRISONERS.—In the Court of Exchequer, on Thursday, the arguments in the case of the Canadian prisoners were resumed, and brought to a close. Lord Coleridge announced that the Court would take time to consider its judgment; and added—"It could not allow the case to be brought to a close without expressing on behalf of himself and his learned brethren their deep impression of the able advocacy in which it had been argued on behalf of the prisoners by Mr. Hill and his learned counsel, as well as on the part of the Crown. The whole matter had been most ably argued, and which, I might have thrown upon the law affecting this important subject, but which he begged to express his thanks to the learned counsel."—Ibid.

Mrs. Press, the old-depart missionary, is well known and highly respected as the author of "India in Queen Victoria's manity," has gained the prize offered by Sir F. Brouncker for the best essay on Capital Punishment. The successful competition is now in print before us (Ward and Co., London.) With his usual modesty, and needless distrust of himself, the benevolent author has relied extensively upon the works of preceeding writers on this interestingly interesting subject. The opponents of a sanguinary penal code, however, are laid under great obligations to him by the clear and concise manner in which he has presented the views of the most eminent jurists and moralists. His little volume forms an excellent text-book for those who, with ourselves, are anxious to put a final and total end to the barbarous system of legal murder; and, as such, we most earnestly recommend it.—Christ. Adv.

CURIOUS PACTS IN A WILL.—Peter Columbelle, of Darley, near Bakewell, in his will, dated 20th October, 1616, has the following extraordinary clause:—"Now, for all such household goods at Darley, whereof John Hallowe hath an inventory, my will is, that my son Roger shall have them all towards house-keeping, under this condition—if at any time hereafter any of his brothers or sisters shall find him taking tobacco, that then he or she so finding and making just proof to my executors, shall be able to sell goods, or the full value thereof, according as they shall be pleased, which said goods shall presently after my death be valued and prayed to my executors for that purpose."—Pat.

HINT TO ATTORNEYS.—At the recent assize, Mr. Baron Alderson refused costs to the plaintiffs on all the counts for which the verdict went for the defendants. The consequences will be, that the plaintiffs will in many cases be out of pocket, even after obtaining a verdict in their favour. His lordship said the judges had determined upon strictly adhering to this rule, in consequence of the unnecessary multiplication of pleadings.—Durham Paper.

IMPORTANCE OF CHEAP POSTAGE TO THE LAW.—Not less striking than the suppression of correspondence caused by high postage, is the evasion of postage itself. On a moderate computation, it is reckoned that for every letter conveyed by the post-office, two are carried illegally. A perfect system of postage-smuggling is established between all the large towns, where letters are delivered for one penny. Old women and children go round to the merchants and tradesmen and collect the letters for the smugglers, whose trade is so thriving that there is competition among them. Four-fifths of the correspondence between Manchester and Liverpool is stated to be carried on by private hands. And Mr. Peacock, the solicitor to the Post-office, avows that it is beyond the power of the law to stop the practice; and this avowal is corroborated by the statement of an extensive bookseller, that the people "laugh at Post-office prosecutions," and bid defiance to detection.—Law Magazine.

REGULATION OF ENGLISH PRISONS.—The House of Commons, on Monday, went into Committee on the Bill for the better ordering of Prisons. Clause 34, which provides that in order to prevent contamination arising from the association of prisoners, any prisoner may be separately confined during a part or the whole of his term, was strongly opposed.—Lord John Russell said, he intended to propose a grant of money for the erection of a model prison. The Committee divided, and the clause was adopted, by a vote of 117 to 58. Another division took place on a motion by Mr. Hume, to amend clause 18th, so as to abolish superannuation allowances to Chaplains and Gaolers; which amendment was rejected by 144 to 81; and the Committee rose.—Christ. Adv.

EMIGRATION OF THE HOWITS.—We learn from the Sheffield Iris, that the Howits, of Nottingham, are going to settle in Australia. William will stay at home, but Dr. Geoffrey and Richard, with a numerous accompaniment of relatives, and a few scientific friends, intend emigrating in the autumn; their meaning is to found a happy and social little settlement there.—Ibid.

THE JEW'S DAUGHTER.—Mr. Henry Fitzroy, M. P. for Lanes, and Lord Southampton's brother, was married on Monday, to a daughter of the late Mr. Rothschild. In reference to this marriage, the Evening Post says—"The fair lady, a short time since, waited upon a venerable Prelate to consult him on the change of her faith; and his Grace having objected to a change of religion grounded on an affaire de cœur, the fair Jewess convinced him that from her earliest youth she had been longing for the hour when she might adopt Christianity. The fortune of the young bride and proselyte is said to be a hundred and fifty thousand pounds."—Ibid.

MR. HARVEY IS CURVING. it is supposed, with considerable success, for the office of Chief Commissioner of the City Police.—Ibid.

TOWN-MADR.—Some time since a lady of Biggleswade, happening to be in London, saw a very handsome and apparently thorough-bred pointer, which she purchased and took home with her. She petted the dog, which began to get fat, but one day the skin became loose. Upon examination the animal turned out to be a mongrel our news up in a puddle's skin, and sold at a high price.—Bristol Gazette.

THE FATE OF RACING HORSES.—Ambo, the fastest mile horse of his day, and that won the Holywell Stakes three years in succession, was assigned to drag an enormous coach through Shrewsbury. When no longer capable of fast, he was degraded to yet lower labour, and was at length found dead in a ditch from absolute starvation. Hit or Miss, a good racer, was during the last years of his life, seen drawing coal in a giggle in the same town. Mameluke is at this time drawing a cab in the streets of the metropolis. And Gallopod, after having won for his different owners 17 years, was afflicted with incurable stringhalt, and was sold at a repository for less than 4s. Thence the hero of the turf was doomed to an omnibus; there he was cruelly used, the spasmodic convulsion that characterizes stringhalt sadly aggravating his torture. The skin was rubbed from his shoulders, his hips and haunches were bruised in every part, and his stifles were continually and painfully coming in contact with the pole. In this situation he was sent by the veterinary surgeon (the author himself) to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and bought in order to be slaughtered.—Yonani on Cruelty to Animals.

THE DARLING FUND.—The various committees, except that of Newcastle, have renituted their subscriptions to Alcock; and last week the contribution stood as follows.—Total received for rewarding the Darlings and the Sanderland fishermen, 200l. 10s.; ditto received by Grace Darling for her own use, 254l. 12s.; ditto ditto, William Darling, ditto, 50l.—Total, 665l. 2s. 10d.—Christ. Adv.

THE CRIMINAL RECORDS OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE, for the year 1838, show that a vast proportion of the accused were neither read nor write, and prove the necessity of national education, by showing that not more than one in ten can read or write. It is, however, a most striking and gratifying fact that the facility of writing and reading bears an exact proportion to the number of those who having been committed are acquitted.—Ibid.

THE CASE OF SHAKESPEARE'S DEATH DISCOVERED.—The illness of which Shakespeare died is stated by Dr. Charles Severn, Registrar of the London Medical Society, in his just published account of the Diary of the Rev. John Ward, A. M., Vicar of Stratford-upon-Avon, 1692-1691. Ward's words are:—"Shakespeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and it seems drank too hard, for Shakespeare died of a fever there contracted."—Ibid.

EXTORTION OF PUNISH.—The deriving of punishment from punishment—can be stoutly brought about in imitation of the "E-tree."—

"—'silly, he would have added"—of the Critic. Brydone, we believe, in his Skullion Tour, made a mock who has had an overdose of the mixture the night before, without knowing the name of it, complain of headache, and ask what the fascinating and mischievous compound was called; and, on its being intimated for his information, exclaims, "Ah! I always knew that Pontic (Pontius Pilate) for an arch deceiver!" This is the better etymology.—Reverend's Review of Crofton Croker's Popular Songs of Ireland.

LONGEVITY.—At the recent trial of the case of the Pr. of Beverley v. Tuke, at the York Assize, the total ages of 27 witnesses, who proceeded by the packet, was computed by a passenger at 2,111, making an average of 78 for each passenger. They varied from 96 to 70.—Pat.

LORD NORTH'S WIT.—When a vehement declaimer, calling aloud for his head, turned round and perceived his victim unexpectantly indulging in a soft snub, and, becoming still more exasperated, denounced the minister as being asleep while he ruined his country—the latter only complained how cruel it was to be denied a silence which other criminals so often enjoyed, that of having a night's rest before their fate. When surprised in a like indulgence during the performance of a very inferior artist, who, however, showed equal indignation at so ill-timed a recreation, he contented himself with observing how hard it was he should be grudge so very natural a release from considerable suffering; but, of recasting himself, added, that it was somewhat unjust in the spectators, to condemn him for taking the remedy which he had himself been considerate enough to administer. The same good-humour and driftery quitted him not when in opposition. Every one has heard of the speech which, if it had failed to figure the objects of its attack, was very effectual in affixing a name upon its honest and unrepugnant author. On Mr. Martin's proposal to have a standing place near the speaker, not to repeat the cry of "Infamous coalition." Lord North coolly suggested that, as long as the worthy member was preserved to them, it would be a needless waste of the public money, since the starting might well perform his office by deputy.—Brougham.

INSTANCES OF LONGEVITY IN TEMPERATE PERSONS.—Pythagoras, who was both the teacher and pattern of temperance, lived a century; the philosopher Gorgias, who never studied the more gratification of his appetite, attained to 107; Hippocrates lived above 100 years; Sophocles, at 90, produced one of the most elaborate compositions of the dramatic kind, that the human genius ever perfected, and lived to be near 100; the amiable Xenophon was above 90; Plato reached his 81st year; Diogenes died about 80; Zeno attained his 80th year; and Cleanthes his 80th. Pindar, who begins his poems with declaring war to be the best thing in nature, lived almost through a century. Such instances of longevity are very rarely to be found in courts and cities. Courts have ever been the schools of intemperance and virtue, and great cities the graves of the human species. In the middle station of life, where men live rationally, in the humble cottage, whose inhabitants are accustomed to abstinence, in hermitages and monasteries, where the ascetic mortifies his desires, and imposes abstinence upon himself from religious considerations,—in these sequestered scenes and walks of life, we are to search for those who reach the ultimate boundaries of this life's short pilgrimage.—Ed. Harwood, D. D.

NEW HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT.—ANTIQUEARIAN DISCOVERIES.—The excavation that it was necessary to make in order to lay the foundation of the river embankment wall to the new Houses of Parliament has been the means of bringing to light a great number of relics of antiquity, which were dug up from time to time by the workmen as the excavation proceeded. The most remarkable feature of the discovery is the great mass of dugout and earthenware, especially the former, that have been found, and which, from their various make and appearance, are evidently the collection of ages. They are of all shapes, sizes, and sorts of workmanship, from the rudely-made hunting-knife or dirk, to the costly and highly-finished siletto. There are no handles to any of them, which is easily accounted for, as that part being generally composed of less durable material, has commonly long since decayed. Some of the blades are in high preservation, and a few which are inlaid with gold are almost as perfect as when first wrought. The next singular discovery is a quantity of keys, which are of various sizes, and some of them of very curious workmanship. A variety of old coins, principally copper, together with two or three small Roman earthen pots, some fossils of an ordinary class, one or two human skulls, and several human skulls (the latter being remarkably large and thick), made up the collection, which is the property of Mr. Barry, the architect, who, previously to the excavation, made an agreement that all curiosities, &c., found were to be given up to him, but the labourers have no doubt privately disposed of many.—Pat.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Shortly before the debate closed on Tuesday night, Lord John Russell was the first man to rise, and was led out of the House by Lord Morpeth and Mr. Hauserman. His lordship, however, shortly rallied, and the noble lord is completely recovered.—Ibid.

CAUSE OF STABBING are frightfully increasing. Murders are frequent; mostly from the practice of knife-carrying, and drunkenness.—Ibid.

EXPENSES OF PARLIAMENT.—An estimate of the sum required to be voted in the year 1889 to defray the charge for salaries and expenses of the two Houses of Parliament, and of allowances to retired officers of the two Houses for the year ending 31st March, 1890.

For salaries, expenses, &c., of the House of Lords, ... £37,700
For salaries, expenses, &c., of the House of Commons, 29,700
Miscellaneous Charges, ... 18,000
—Parliamentary Paper.

IMPORTED FOREIGN CORN, &c.—The quantity of grain of all sorts, wheat and flour, imported into Great Britain and Ireland in the year ending 31st Jan., 1889, and the average prices, was as follows:—

	Av. Prices.
	Qrs.	Bush.	s. d.

NEW ZEALAND ASSOCIATION.—A party of gentlemen interested in the colonization of New Zealand, went on Saturday to Blackwall to inspect the barque Torg, a vessel of 400 tons, in which the new company's first exploring and surveying expedition will go out, under the command of Colonel Wakefield.—Christ. Adv.

HOUSE OF COBURG.—The house of Saxe-Coburg is undoubtedly the most fortunate of the existing great families of Europe. No common lot has attended them in our time, and they appear destined to fill a remarkable place in modern history. The reigning duke has succeeded to the inheritance of the duchy of Saxe-Coburg, which he enjoys in addition to his original sovereignty of Gotha. His brother Leopold has been made an extraordinary peer; he first married the heiress to the British throne, and subsequently a daughter of the King of the French; two ladies not less amiable than elevated; and, after declining the throne of Greece, he has been chosen King of Belgium. One sister espoused the Archduke Constantine of Russia, and thus in the ordinary course of events would have become Empress of all the Russias. The history of another sister, the Duchess of Kent, is too well known to require comment; she is the mother of the Queen of England. Another brother has married one of the greatest heiresses of the Austrian empire, the daughter of the Prince of Kohary, and occupies the high post of Lieutenant-field-marshal in the service of the Emperor. Finally, a nephew of the Duchess of Kent is the reigning King of Portugal. An impartial review of the progress of this distinguished family compels us to add, that it does not on its own success to unruly intrigue; its members bear their great estate with prudence, with good sense, and with moderation; and their domestic qualities form an antidote to the venom which generally pursues a career of success.—Hackin's Germany.

CRACOW.—The Courrier Francais states, that a new decree of expulsion had been issued in Cracow against all foreigners who are not subjects of one or other of the three Powers in whose name the city and territory are occupied. Two special exceptions had been granted, but the order would not be executed in less rigorously, and several most honourable strangers settled in Cracow for many years would only be allowed a short delay to wind up their affairs. The shadow of Government which existed was not able to protect even the native citizens of the republic; a number of persons had been lately expelled from the country who were not allowed to seek an asylum abroad. They were sent on a surveillance into districts assigned to them by the police of the protecting Powers.—Pat.

HAARLEM.—The draining of the great lake of Haarlem, which has been so often projected, has at length been decided upon by the States General of Holland, by a majority of 43 to 6. The expense of this work is estimated at eight millions of florins.—Ibid.

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.—An immense monolithic column, which is intended to form a monument in honour of Napoleon at Ajaccio, had been cut in the granite quarries of Algaia, in Corsica, and successfully placed on a machine for receiving it during the final operation of polishing, &c. This block is 33 feet in length, and 11 feet diameter at its larger end; its weight is 1,200,000 lbs. The whole of the operation for moving the column from the quarries, conducted under the superintendence of M. Bize, builder of Paris, occupied no more than 20 workmen; and the mechanism is stated to have been very simple and ingenious.—Ibid.

THE EAST.—It was reported in Constantinople on the 10th ultimo, that a despatch had been received from Colonel Nohel, announcing a serious defeat of the British army at Peshawar.—Christ. Adv.

RUSSIA.—At the Court of Russia, there appears to be no doubt of Count Nesselrode's disgrace. His appointments at home and abroad have been rescinded by the Emperor; who, it is said, thus evinces hostility to England, which Nesselrode carefully avoided.—Ibid.

CIRCASSIA.—Letters of the 12th March from St. Petersburg quote accounts from Tiflis, to show that the war against the Circassians was far from terminated. The Abasian Prince had sent to Constantinople to propose their submission to the Sultan, declaring their readiness to pay him an annual tribute, to furnish contingent in cavalry, and maintain, at their own expense, a Turkish Governor in Abasia, who would defend them against the Russians. They were, at the same time, unwilling to allow the departure of Mr. Bell, whom they considered the representative of England. They had likewise manifested an intention, if England would grant them official aid, not only to oppose the attempts of Russia against the British possessions in India, but to excite a revolt in Georgia and the Caucasus countries. This intelligence had so exasperated the Emperor Nicholas, that he had sent orders to General Goltz to carry on a war of extermination in Circassia. These orders had been published officially at St. Petersburg.—Pat.

UNITED STATES AND NEW BRUNSWICK.—Intelligence from New York, 8th April, has been received. It is of a pacific character. Through the mediation of the American General Scott, the withdrawal of the troops both of Maine and New Brunswick from the disputed territory has been arranged; and only a civil force, to prevent the timber from being depredated, is to be kept up until the question is finally settled. The commercial accounts are unfavourable.—Christ. Adv. 6th May.

MR. NICHOLAS BIDDLE has resigned his post as President of the Bank of the United States. Mr. Thomas Dunlap, one of the cashiers, was unanimously elected to supply Mr. Biddle's place.—Christ. Adv.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE PRESIDENT IN COUNCIL.

Fort William, 23d July, 1889.

No. 117 of 1889.—Assistant Surgeon A. Campbell, Assistant to the Resident at Coimbatore, was appointed in the Medical Department, under date the 2d instant, to the charge of the Civil Station of Darjeeling.

THE REVIVAL OF THE COOLY TRADE.—The Quarterly Review has, in the last number, given in its adhesion to the Cooly Trade and to Puseyism. The following is the passage in that journal in which an attempt is made to defend the transportation of our labourers:—

"Asia has, therefore, continued in its previous state, until now that America, in conjunction with Europe, has commenced its powerful action upon it; and if we carry forward our speculations to what another century may effect, we may, at least, conclude with certainty, that when the United States shall contain a hundred millions of people, and Australia its millions, too, the free labour of the Asiatic with his brethren of the other quarters of the world, will be completely established, and it will long have ceased to be a question among politicians, whether one nation is justified in interdicting the natives of another from making use of the right which God has conferred on all his creatures—that of bettering their condition by voluntary emigration. To imprison eighty or ninety millions of human beings as if they were so better than rats in an iron cage—to debar the Hindu from exporting himself, as well as the fruit of his labour—to make his going so dependent on the pleasure of the people of England—is an attempt as wholly at variance with right and reason, that, under present circumstances, it promises no better result than that of Xenos to fatter the sea. In this age of universalism, however, none may be deterred by giving to anything a name which ought to deter its opposite. Many a sane dog has lost his life from being called a mad dog; and, in this case, it is endeavoured to affix the opprobrious epithet of slave trade to the act of conveying a labourer from Bengal, where slavery exists and is legal, to Guiana or Australia, where it does not exist, is not legal, and where the difficulty experienced is to do justice to the rights of the master. But this emigration, to be an efficient means of extensive good, must be purified from all association with violence and fraud. The annual emigration from Europe to America may be estimated at 100,000 to 150,000; so that, including negro slaves, 500,000 persons are transferred yearly from the Old to the New World, and if Asia has free access to this means of relief from over-population, that number might be indefinitely augmented, and a real, natural, and effectual counter-agent to the African slave trade be set in motion. In the event, too, of a famine in India, the lives of 50,000 or 100,000 natives could be saved, were the means of transport in readiness, and the people familiarised, as those of Ireland are, to exportation. Is it so shocking a thing to be benevolent feeling, that a man should be taken, of his own free will, from a country where day's wages are twopenny, and conveyed to another, where he can earn about a shilling?"

Thereader will not fail to perceive, that the only two grounds upon which, in the estimation of the reviewer, the emigration of labourers from India can be justified, are wanting; the freedom of the set, and the over-population of India. He says, "this emigration, to be an efficient means of extensive good, must be purified from all association with violence and fraud." The evidence which is before the public of India shews, with the clearest demonstration, that in spite of the precautions adopted by the Local Government, violence, the most palpable, and fraud, the most unblushing, have characterized the management of this new trade. "If Asia," continues the reviewer, "had free access to this means of relief from over-population," &c. Over-population in India, indeed, of which the writer declares in the very same article, "there is in India one-third part in jungle, or waste, much of it never yet cleared!" The reviewer is displeased with the name, the Cooly Trade, by which the new system has been designated. He says, "In this case, it is endeavoured to fix the opprobrious epithet of slave trade to the act of conveying a labourer from Bengal, where slavery exists, to Guiana or Australia, where it does not exist, is not legal, and where the difficulty experienced is to do justice to the rights of the master." The reviewer is, perhaps, not aware, that the term Cooly Trade was not invented by those who are opposed to emigration, but by those who were actively engaged in it. This appropriate designation was supplied by those who had the best means of knowing the real character of the transaction, by having largely participated in its gains. "Is it so shocking a thing," continues the writer, "to benevolent feeling, that a man should be taken of his own free will, from a country where day's wages are twopenny, and conveyed to another where he can earn about a shilling?" Perhaps not; but is it not a shocking thing to take a Cooly to a country where his legitimate pay would be a shilling, and by taking advantage of his utter ignorance of the fact, to exact a bond from him before he embarks to work for five years, for less than a third of that sum?

It is evident from the tenor of this article, that a vigorous effort is about to be made in England to revive the Cooly Trade, and that the whole weight of the West India interest, which, for forty years, has so strenuously resisted the voice of humanity, and opposed the wishes of the people of England, will be powerfully exerted on this occasion. Her Majesty's Ministers cannot be depended on for any resolute resistance of this nefarious project. Their lukewarmness in the cause of negro emancipation forbids us to hope for any thing from their virtue. The demand of the Colonies for Indian labourers,—free labourers as they are speciously called,—to rescue them from the ruin which is described as staring them in the face, through a destitution of hands, will over-balance, in the ministerial councils, every consideration of justice and humanity. From the House of Lords no assistance can be expected; and from the Commons nearly as little. The conduct of the liberal members, in the case of the refractory Assembly of Jamaica, may teach us what will be the complexion of their advice on this momentous question. Already do we hear from the Mauritius, that a Bill, legalising the exportation of labourers from India, is expected to be passed, without delay. Our only dependence, therefore, is upon the moral energy of the people of England, which, by an unexampled effort, has constrained the unwilling legislature to break the bonds of the African slave. India requires another campaign of agitation to kindle throughout the country a feeling of humanity towards the millions of its population; who, if the Bill passes, will be inevitably torn from their homes by fraud or violence; separated from all domestic sympathies, and swept into a distant captivity. If a Bill to legalize the trade, under any system of checks whatsoever, be once passed, all our Colonies will be taught to look to India for a supply of labourers to displace the Negro; and a hundred thousand unhappy victims of European cupidity, will be annually exported from the shores of India, never to return, under the plausible pretence that "to imprison eighty or ninety millions of human beings, as if they were no better than rats, in an iron cage, is contrary to right and reason."

We call, then, for the instant publication of the Report of the Cooley Committee, which was appointed to take evidence on this subject six months ago. They have already incurred a fearful responsibility by their acquiescence. If a Bill should have passed during the Session of this year, again to open the ports of India for the exportation of labourers, the public will not fail to lay much of the guilt of this calamity at the door of those who having taken evidence, which might have averted it, have allowed the golden opportunity to slip from their hands. The battle must be fought over again, and there is no time to be lost. It is possible that Her Majesty's Ministers may be too deeply engaged in the reconstruction of the Cabinet, and in precautionary measures for prolonging their political existence, to bring forward a Bill in this Session; but the next Session will assuredly bring up the question; and the friends of humanity must arm themselves for the struggle. They must meet the demands of the Colonists, the avarice of proprietors, and the easy disposition of ministers, not with idle declamation, but with facts; with an incontrovertible statement of the violence and fraud by which the system has been marked in India, notwithstanding the vigilance of Government. They must be prepared to shew, that, from the ignorance and weakness of the Native character, these evils are inseparable from the transportation of Indian labourers to colonies beyond sea; and upon these unerring data, they must found their appeal to the generous and noble feelings of the British nation. Again, therefore, do we call for The Report, without the smallest delay.

NATIVE OFFICERS IN THE MIDNAPORE DISTRICT.—We publish, with much pleasure, the letter of Defensor, relative to the delinquencies charged on the Native Officers of the Midnapore district, by Mr. Page. The letter is evidently written by one who is qualified, by his intimate knowledge of their characters, to speak with authority on the subject; and his remarks cannot fail, therefore, to qualify, in some degree, the censure which has been heaped on them. On the general subject of extortions, of which Mr. Page presented a fearful catalogue, our Correspondent says nothing; and we may, therefore, take his silence for an admission of their existence. Indeed, it is perfectly known to Government, that such extortions are constantly practised; and the most strenuous efforts of the public authorities have been directed for many years to the extinction of these abuses. Mr. Page has, therefore, communicated no new fact; though, by going into details, and bringing the mass of extortions into one point of view, he has done service, by rendering them more prominent and glaring. We do not require to be told that Natives are Natives, and will act as Natives, all India over. But what we really need, is the suggestion of a full, practical and effectual remedy; and if the Correspondent of the Englishman can point out such an one, he will deserve the gratitude equally of the people and the Government.

We have received a letter from Midnapore, doubtless from some of the Amils, pointing out, in ten closely written pages, a great variety of crimes and misdemeanours with which the writer says Mr. Page is chargeable. In true Native style, he begins with Mr. Page's parents, as though any retaliation on the relatives of his accuser, could weaken the strength of the charges he brings against the public officers. Having no particular anxiety for the publication of libellous matter, we immediately consigned it to the refuse box.

Our Correspondent, Defensor, alludes to the douceurs which are so frequently given to the head men of Attornies in the Supreme Court, and asks us to verify his statement by enquiry. That task, however, must be referred to other agency than ours. Our acquaintance with that Court is gathered only from the public records of its proceedings. We deeply regret to say that we have not the honour to number a single practising barrister among our supporters; and of the forty-six attornies, we have but three on our list; and they happen to be personal friends. This indifference to our humble labours would be, indeed, distressing, if we were not so amply compensated by the kindness of the majority of the Bench.

THE CHUNDRIKA ON DUELLING.—Our old friend, the Editor of the Chundrika, the great say and prop of Hindoo orthodoxy, the Secretary to the Dhurmas Sabha, established for the purpose of bringing back the rite of Suttee, has taken advantage of a recent duel, to read a lecture to the English, on the evils of duelling. We have translated it for the benefit of our readers and placed it among our selections. We are happy to see him so usefully employed. He has completely the upper-hand of us in this argument. When he upbraids us with this preposterous practice, after we have put down female immolation, on the ground of humanity, every man of right feeling must perceive with shame, the anomalous spectacle which we exhibit to the eyes of the Natives. Nothing was said against Suttees, which may not be advanced, with equal force, against duelling; and there are none of the excuses which have been advanced in its favour, which might not be brought forward with ten-fold force in favour of the burning of widows. But in the motive, there is a most material difference altogether in favour of Suttees. While the leading cause of duel is the passion of revenge, Suttees owed their origin and continuance to a perversion of one of the purest feelings of our nature, conjugal affection. The English have endeavoured to inculcate sentiments of justice and humanity in the Native community, by abolishing Suttees, and judicial mutilation, and flogging in the Native array; but all these lessons are worse than useless, while we continue to admit of duelling; because they only serve to exhibit us to the people of India in the light of hypocrites. The advice of a good old divine may well apply in the present instance to Europeans in India. "Either teach by your example, or teach not at all." The Chundrika is perfectly right when he charges us with the most glaring inconsistency, in continuing to murder each other in private quarrels, after we have forbidden the Natives to murder their widows. And we advise him to call an especial meeting of the Dhurmas Sabha, and to draw up a petition forthwith,—not to the Privy Council,—but to both Houses of Parliament, praying that the rite of Suttee may be restored to the Natives of India, until duelling be abolished, under the severest penalties, by the Legislature; that while the English gentlemen are at liberty to call out and shoot each other with impunity, in accordance with the custom of society, the Natives may be at liberty, in like manner, to burn up their living widows, in compliance with a custom, which has been sanctioned through the four yugas, &c. &c. &c.; and to order that this Petition be presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Galtan, and to the Upper House, by Lords Londonderry and Winchester.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS.—Our Correspondent, J. K. E., differs from us on the subject of judicial swearing, because he thinks that, at least occasionally, it will elicit the truth, when otherwise it would be concealed. We have no doubt the fact may be as he states it. But yet the question is open, whether for the attainment of that occasional advantage, we do right to keep up continually the professions and manifold evils of the systematic administration of oaths: especially seeing the feelings of the people respecting oaths are such, as to compel us to dispense with them from all our best witnesses. It is a gross and mischievous inconsistency to hold that the administration of oaths is requisite for the purposes of justice; and yet, innumerable, and altogether indefinable, instances of exception, to forego what we maintain to be requisite. Our Correspondent tries, indeed, to reduce to a definition the respectability that should entitle a witness to exemption from swearing; but we cannot congratulate him on his success. We prefer the test of a man's keeping a gig, to his more refined substitute. In the former there is, at least, something definite and tangible; but what "that quality of mind which renders it solemn declaration a better security for the veracity of a deponent than an oath," may be, we cannot divine; and if we could, it would still puzzle us to know how to recognise its existence amongst the witnesses in a Court. We cannot comprehend how, in any case, a solemn declaration can be a better security for veracity than an oath. We can believe them, in a conscientious person, to be of equal value; but why the declaration should ever be more secure than the oath, is to us inexplicable. The real case is, that our Courts want oaths from all witnesses; but respectable men will not give them, except on compulsion, and the Courts are obliged to be content with what they will give. Hence the anomaly we wish to be remedied.

There is a point, on which we should like to have the opinion of our Correspondent. Does he think the fear of false swearing is connected solely with the idolatrous symbol, which is generally used; or would adjuration by the name of God, without the addition either of an idol's name, or an idolatrous symbol, be equally binding on the firm-doos? We shall feel obliged, if he will favour us with the opinion to which his experience and observation may lead him on this point.

PERSPECTIVES OF CRIMINAL STATISTICS OF BENGAL, BY G. T. F. SPEKDE.—It is not long since we directed attention to the Criminal Statistics of Bengal, and expressed the wish that ample information on the subject were before the public. We took up Mr. Speed's Prospectus, therefore, with satisfaction, as promising to gratify our wish. But our satisfaction was of very short continuance. Mr. Speed may be very familiar with the Police. At least he has had the opportunity of being so. But he has forgotten to tell us, what are the official documents to which he has been allowed access, or what sort of elaboration he means to make there pass through. The official documents, as they are, could not fail to be valuable and interesting; but what they may be when worked up by Mr. Speed, into "a short statistical treatise on the state of crime throughout the Bengal Provinces," is quite another thing. If the treatise proves to be of the same quality as the Prospectus, we cannot promise the compiler any success in his labours. The Prospectus opens with these remarks. "At the present period when the attention, not only of the several branches of Indian Legislature, but the thoughts also of so many individuals have been directed to the Police and Criminal Jurisprudence of the country, the want of some digested information on the state of crime is much felt, since, without a clear understanding of that branch of the subject, all plans or projects for improvement of our Police arrangements, must be merely speculative and indefinite, as most of them already proposed exhibit to the attentive reader; for it is obviously of little use legislating to the mere end that—because such a number of individuals form the present Police Strength,—and improved surveillance such a less numerical force only will be required; unless we at the same time can so regulate that force to meet the exigencies of the several districts, as evincing in their inhabitants a greater or less aptitude to criminal actions."

We have done our best to make out the author's meaning; but it is far beyond our depth. Perhaps our worthy friend, Dr. Corby, will interpret for us.

MISSIONARY CHURCHES.—The principle, that the evangelisation of the world is the peculiar work of the Churches of Christ, has not only begun to attract attention, but is already extensively adopted. It is so in North America, and still more distinctly in Scotland. The change which is thus occasioned, in the economy of Christian benevolence and enterprise, is even making progress in England. But it is there the change is most required, and is most difficult of attainment. For the purpose of recommending and promoting it, we shall now glance at its progress and results, where it has been already introduced.

We shall commence our review with Scotland. And it is a very remarkable fact to begin with, that in that country there is no religious denomination by which the principle we have stated is not fully acknowledged and acted upon. The Established Church may, perhaps, be said to have led the way in this reformation. Ever since it entertained the project of the Indian Mission, about a dozen years ago, it has been making rapid progress in the development of Christian zeal and energy; and its four Committees on Election, Foreign Missions, Church Extension, and Colonial Churches are both its glory and its life. In some of their proceedings there has been no small admixture of overweening sectarianism; but, notwithstanding this drawback, they are, on the whole, much to be commended. At present we are not prepared to furnish such an account of the system of evangelisation adopted by the Church of Scotland, as would satisfy ourselves; but we may return to this subject hereafter.

The ecclesiastical body in Scotland, next in importance to the Established Church, is the Secession Church; which, according to statement in the Secession Magazine for June, 1838, numbers 319 congregations, and 18 stations regularly supplied with preaching, with 336 ministers. The Secession Church adopts the same ecclesiastical polity, and doctrinal standards as the Established Church. The great difference between the two, arises out of the question whether the Church should be allied with the State; on which the Secession Church very strenuously maintains the negative. In Christian zeal and liberality it will bear comparison with any religious community with which we are acquainted. The principal features of its system are well worthy of consideration.

The Secession Church carries on its operations by three Funds, raised by the contributions of its congregations. The first, seldom exceeding £700 per annum, is appropriated to the relief of weak emigrations, the assistance of aged and infirm ministers, and the support of the Theological Institution. Another fund has lately been instituted to aid in liquidating the debt of weak congregations, and erecting new places of worship. And the last and chief is the Mission fund; which, in 1837, had risen to about £5,000. The first number of a Quarterly Record of the Secession Missions, was published in January, 1838, from which we learn, that, although the Secession Church had largely participated in the Missionary spirit, which was awakened, in almost every religious denomination, about the close of the last century, and furnished both funds and Missionaries to those Societies which grew out of it, "it was not until the year 1829, that the Synod, besides adopting measures for prosecuting Home Missions on an extensive and regular plan, resolved to institute Foreign Missions, to be conducted under its own superintendence. From that period, the missionary spirit pervading the Body experienced a marked increase, and has ever since been expanding in power and effort. A very considerable sum was immediately put into the treasury of the Synod for missionary purposes; congregational societies began to be formed, or collections to be made, in a majority of its congregations; and the fund raised by these means is still yearly increasing. Thus the Synod was enabled, in pursuance of its plan, to send out three Missionaries to Upper Canada, in the year 1832; and their number, (diminished by one death,) has, by subsequent additions, been increased to eleven ministers, who have formed a presbytery in that colony, having under their care between thirty and forty congregations. The West Indies were the next field of missionary labour to which the attention of the Synod was directed; and to these interesting islands they have sent six Missionaries, one being stationed in Trinidad, and the rest in Jamaica, together with one Catechist. Two additional Catechists are to sail in the course of the winter; and each of the Missionaries is provided with one or more teachers, who aid them in imparting to the negroes the elements of useful knowledge. Encouraged by the success attending these first efforts, the Synod has, this year, sent the Rev. William Glen, late of Astoria, to reside in Persia, for the purpose of completing his translation of the Old Testament into the language of that country. They have also some prospect of commencing a Mission on the Continent of Europe; and they have entered into arrangements with the London Missionary Society for an expeditious voyage to some of the yet heathen islands of the South Sea, where, if Providence favour their designs, they hope, ere long, to have preachers of the everlasting gospel. At the same time that these exertions have been made for the benefit of foreign countries, the efforts of the Secession Church for the propagation of the gospel in the Highlands, Islands, and other destitute districts, of our own land, so far from relaxing, have proportionally increased."

Since the date of this statement, we observe, that in September last another Missionary, the Rev. William Scott, was ordained for Jamaica, and the Rev. M. Major has been appointed a Missionary in Strathclyde.

There is reason to rejoice, then, in the operations of the Secession Church, because of the extent of good accomplished by them. But the system on which they are conducted is even more worthy of congratulation: for it will be found to provide against the chief, if not the whole, of the evils attending the Society system, and to secure advantages of which it is altogether destitute.

The funds of the Secession Church are obtained, as we have seen, partly by Congregational Collections, but in preference, by Congregational Societies: that is, in either case, from the free-will offerings of the people in their several churches. And so entirely are the hearts of the people themselves enlisted to the sacred cause, that no necessity is found for a general Agency, to keep alive their zeal, and stimulate their generosity. The efforts of the Congregational Societies almost surpass belief, and far exceed what would be understood merely from the sums which reach the treasury of the Synod. In Edinburgh, the congregation in Broegleton Place expended, in addition to the support of its own minister, and the general maintenance of divine worship, for its own edification, in 1837, £574, and in 1838, £533, besides making numerous collections for different Societies, and beginning a liberal subscription for the New Synod Fund: the congregation in Rose Street, in 1837, raised £374, besides a subscription for the New Fund: the congregation in Nicholson Street, in 1837, contributed £261, and in 1838, £496; and that in Bristo Street, in 1837, £154, and in 1838, £241. But the most distinguished of all the Congregational Societies is in Glasgow, in the Greyfriars Church. In 1837, this congregation, besides providing £370 for their present minister, and £100 for the widow of his predecessor, expended £1227; and in 1838 they raised their general contributions to £2,929. Many of the congregations in the smaller towns, and even in small villages, exhibit a proportionate liberality.

It is particularly to be remarked that all these congregations enjoy perfect independence in the appropriation of their funds, notwithstanding their ecclesiastical connection with the Synod: and by this means they have the opportunity both of invigorating their own zeal, and maintaining in activity their sympathies with Christians of other denominations. Thus the congregation in Broegleton Place, in 1838, appropriated their funds in this way:

To Rev. J. Paterson, Missionary, Jamaica,
— one year's salary. . . . .	£250 0 0
— Mr. G. Clarkson, City Missionary, . . . .	50 0 0
— Teacher of the School in connexion with the City Mission. . . . .	14 2 3
— Mrs. Leslie, for Negro School, Jamaica, . .	20 0 0
— Secession Congregation, Larnah, Aberdeen-shire, . . . . .	30 0 0
— Synod Fund for Home Missions, . . . .	80 0 0
— Rev. J. Paterson, Jamaica, in aid in building Church, . . . . .	50 0 0
— Evangelical Society of Paris, . . . . .	18 0 0
— Christian Instruction Society, . . . . .	2 13 4½
— Expenses of Mission School, Low Cuthan, . .	7 0 1

In like manner the Greyfriars' Church support a Foreign Missionary of their own in Trinidad, a Home Missionary at Oms, two City Missionaries in Glasgow, a school with 160 substitute children in attendance, and a Christian Education Society, besides contributing to a variety of public institutions, as, in 1837, the Glasgow Missionary, Trinitarian, and Bible Societies, the Irish Evangelical Society, the Baptist Temperance Mission, Synod Mission Fund, and sending aid to French Protestant Ministers in Strasburg and Lyons. All the Congregational Societies of the Secession Church act upon the same principle; and from one or other of them every Foreign Missionary Society in the United Kingdom receives a more or less assistance. We observe some of them even contributing to the funds of the Established Church, although we fear that in this exercise of liberality there is no likelihood of any reciprocity.

Where individual congregations are not rich enough to follow the example of those we have mentioned, in supporting a Foreign Missionary of their own, they comprised in a single Presbytery unite to do so. In such cases a partiality is shown, to the election of a Missionary from the young preachers rising up amongst the Churches of the particular Presbytery. He is ordained in the midst of the people who are to provide for his support. Before proceeding abroad, he is requested to preach at least once to each of the congregations in the Presbytery, that he may be personally known amongst them all. And on his departure a particular member of the Presbytery is appointed to maintain a direct and constant correspondence with him, and also to keep the congregations informed respecting his success. A similar plan, we believe, is adopted respecting Home Missionaries.

Thus the Secession Church in its Synod funds presents an opportunity to the weakest congregations, of advantageously devoting to the propagation of the gospel whatever in their riches or their poverty they can afford: whilst it also exhibits a long list of independent Missionary Societies, which collect resources upon the strength of their own Christian principle, and spend them at home or abroad upon objects of special interest to their own hearts. And so, without any dangerous centralization of power and patronage, or aggregation of re-

ness, or system of itinerant religious mendicancy, the spiritual energy of the Churches is fostered and exerted, and extensive good is done. At the same time there is enough of combination in the economy and jurisdiction of the Synod for every beneficial purpose. The Missionary Committee collects, as in a focus, the information respecting all that is done by the several Societies; and it undertakes every part of the common enterprise, which requires general co-operation for its execution; and all the Missions, however sent into the field, are ecclesiastically recognized, and directed by the Synod.

The foreign part of the system is as less worthy of notice than the domestic; but we must reserve the exposition of it for another occasion.

WEEKLY EDITOR OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 8.

A correspondence which has passed at Bombay, relative to the distribution of the shares of the Bombay Chartered Bank, is republished in the papers of this day, from which it would appear, as though those who gave in their names for the Joint Stock Bank, are anxious to exclude many of those who petitioned originally for a Chartered Bank, from participating in the benefit of it. The Secretary to Government at Bombay has informed the Bank Committee, that no official communication has been received from the Court of Directors, relative to the gift of a Charter; the report which has been discontinued, relative to the favourable disposition of the Court, may, therefore, after all, be unfounded, and not procure any success.—Of the Iron Steamers which were despatched to this Presidency, two have arrived at Bombay, and will be employed on the Indus. Two other Iron vessels have been sent out to that port on application; but as Government expects shortly a second supply of vessels from England, they will not be required. What a fair opportunity is thus offered for the Carnatic Government to take them up, and thus place the supply of steam freight on our river on a level of greater equality with the demand.—We are happy to learn that Mr. O'Brien, an Unconquered Assistant in the Civil Audit Office, at Agra, is engaged in the compilation of a Vocabulary, embracing all the Revenue Terms now in use in the Upper Provinces.—The Mission which is about to proceed from the Governor General to Rajah Kurruck Sing, to congratulate him on his accession to the throne, consists of Mr. Clerk, Political Agent at Ludianah, and the Hon. Capt. Osborne.—The Natives who were suspected of having set out up four or five men as sacrifices, at a little distance from Chittagong, have been acquitted by the Session Judge Adami, for want of evidence.—The Bishop of Calcutta proceeds on his tour of visitation in a Steamer, in October, as far as Dinapore.—Capt. Fitzgerald, it is said, is to have the charge of constructing the New Cathedral.—Mr. Turner has returned to Calcutta, and resumed his practice in the Supreme Court.—The Exploiter, which was dispatched to Aden with letters from Bombay for the overland mail, has returned leaky; and it has been found that the rats have eaten a number of boxes in her bottom.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 9.

The long expected Kafil, or convoy of provisions, brought up by the Lahore Chief, has, at length, reached the Camp at Candahar. A report having been spread that an attack was intended on it, a Regiment was sent out to its assistance, which lost the way. A second corps was then sent, which came up with the Chief the next morning, who was vexed at the precautions displayed, saying, that after having brought the stores so great a distance, it would be strange if he could not consider them safely a few miles farther to Candahar, without aid. Two thousand mules loaded with grain, marched into camp the next morning, a pleasing sight to a half-starved army. The Lahore Chief brought in more camels than he originally started with, having adopted the wise precaution on his route, of making the villagers restore two for every one that was stolen. The Natives amongst these things better than we do.—The Sherika, in the Khyber Pass, no sooner heard of the death of Runjeet, than they deserted Col. Wade, and returned to the Panjab. A more treacherous and cowardly act can scarcely be conceived.—Mr. Greenway states in his Journal, that Mr. G. J. Gordon has been appointed Secretary to the Union Bank. The Agra Utkhar corrects him by saying, that he has simply been invited to stand for the place, when vacant.—A second charge, arising out of the disturbance made by the officers at Monsieur Dupuis's Hall, has just been tried, though not decided, by the Magistrate. A correspondent states the all but incredible fact, that the defendant was actually seated on the bench with the Magistrate, while the prosecutor brought forward his charges! The Magistrate acts, we believe, under the surveillance of the Supreme Court, and it is to be hoped this Court in future. Even Mr. Long never ventured on such a course.—Capt. H. E. Cockrell, of the local of the house of Cockerell and Co., of Calcutta, died the day before yesterday, at the age of forty, deeply regretted by a very large circle of friends.—Major Tod has started on his Mission to Herat, with several officers, and the substantial sum of three lakhs of Rupees. He quitted the Camp of Candahar with the pomp of a salute.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 10.

At the last meeting of the Asiatic Society, it was stated that the busts of Sir William Jones, Dr. Mill and Mr. Colebrooke were completed in England, and would soon arrive in the country.—Letters have been received from Nepal, stating that Bhern Sen, the former Minister of that Court, who has for some time been in confinement, and subjected to every variety of torture which the ingenuity of man could invent, on just died of the effects of a wound he has inflicted on himself.—Some of the letters which were intended for the Illustrator Mahadabal Nera, have appeared in the Englishman. Why can we not obtain a clear and calm statement of the origin, progress and consummation of the event which excited all that paper? All that we know is, that for an omniscient to give notice of the edict-issuance of the Press on stamped paper, the Printer has been severely confined and sentenced to a fine of 500 Rs., and the Press itself confiscated. These are strange doings; but we cannot go to the trials, and, therefore, the Press at other places cannot come to the rescue of a contemporary in distress.—A case has been tried in the Supreme Court, at Calcutta, by pleading; and strange to say, it is found that this is not an offence recognizable at law by the last Act on the subject!

SUNDAY, AUGUST 12.

The Western papers state, that not only have the six volunteer regiments been ordered to Barrackpore, which looks like the recurrence of a Burmese war; but the corps on the Nepal frontier have orders to hold themselves in readiness for the field, which looks not unlike the rudiments of a Nepal war.—Letters from Simlah state, that Mr. Clerk, the H. M. Captain Osborne, and Capt. Mitchell, of the Gwalior Contingent, will form the deputation to the Rajah Kurruck Sing. The Western Journals express their opinion that the new Rajah has actually refused permission for the conveyance of provisions through his territories for the Army beyond the Indus; a most incredible stroke of ingratitude even for an Indian.—Letters which have been received from Col. Wade's camp, inform us that all the rumours which have been spread about his proceedings in the Khyber Pass, are fictitious; the troops with him have never moved from Peshawar; nor will they move until credible information has been received of the arrival of the Bengal army at Ghizal. It is true, however, that the Sherika have deserted him in great part. General Ventura was among the first to return to the Panjab, as soon as the news of Runjeet Sing's death reached the Sikh encampment.—We learn from the Englishman that a coal mine has been discovered in Pagoda Island, opposite Chudina, on the Arracan Coast; a most convenient locality.—The papers proclaim their own poverty, without emancipation; all is dull, dull, dull, till the next overland mail comes in; and then we shall have a week's extraordinary excitement, to be succeeded by three weeks of progressive insipidity.—The Bombay Mail for the last two days has not arrived, and the Jane Mill is confidently expected.—A Fancy Fair is to be held on the 17th, for the disposal of articles, manufactured by those who are reduced to the necessity of resorting to their own needle and labour for a subsistence. It is an honourable feeling which leads them to prefer any occupation, however humble, to the degradation of mendicancy. We hope the results of the experiment will more than realize the benevolent wishes of those who have started it.—It is said that Sir Henry Pauc comes round immediately to Calcutta. Certainly in the event of a Nepalese and Burmese war, the metropolis is a more appropriate place for the Commander-in-Chief than a Hill, at the Western extremity of India.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 13.

The June Mail, brought from Aden by the Tejpal, reached Calcutta, according to expectation, yesterday afternoon. The most important intelligence brought on this occasion, is the report of a battle between the Egyptian and Turkish armies, in which the latter sustained a complete overthrow; and lost all its baggage, and ammunition, and seven thousand prisoners. So untoward an event as this may effect the politics of all Europe. For the European intelligence we refer to our press.—The army of Joudpore is rapidly coming into a state of organization. It is now said that the refractory Rajah will be covertly, but strongly supported by the Rajpoot States, and it would be no matter of surprise if there should be a general outbreak, more especially if our hands are occupied with Nepal on the East, before the campaign on the West is completed. It is a fortunate circumstance that at such a crisis the management of Rajpootana is entrusted to the vigorous hand of Col. Sutherland.

—The Englishman states that the body of Bheem Sen, the late Minister of Nepal, had been thrown out to be devoured by the kites and jackals. We must find room next week for the very spirited memoir of this illustrious Native, which appeared in yesterday's Englishman.—A Commission has been appointed at Hyderabad, to examine into the fact of a conspiracy, recently discovered there, similar to that which broke out a short time since at Poona.—The Hon. W. W. Bird, Esq., it is stated, will present two prizes to the Hindoo and Sangkrit Colleges, to be awarded to the most meritorious student.—Dr. Raleigh has been elected Surgeon of the Native Hospital.—Sir Edward Ryan has embarked on the Sorema Steam Vessel, for Allahabad.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13.

The Herkens of this morning, on the authority of Paris papers of the 18th June, gives us the melancholy intelligence of the decease of Lord William Bentinck, at that place, on the preceding day, the 17th June.—It is stated that arrangements have been made for Lord Auckland's departure from the Hills, and that His Lordship will visit Gwalior before he comes down to the Presidency.—The Agra Bank has just declared a dividend of nine per cent. A list of the Proprietors appears in the last number of the Agra Observer, from which we learn that the number of Native capitalists, who have taken an interest in the Bank, does not exceed above six. The Plantagenet, which sailed from England on the 14th June, brings out a strong reinforcement of Missionaries, Protestant and Catholic. Among the passengers, we notice the Rev. Mr. Chadwick, Catholic Priest, with four students; the Rev. Mr. Pearce, of Circular Road, with nine missionary gentlemen, and two apparently German Missionaries, the Rev. Messrs. Lapp and Crossman.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

London Mail to the 15th of June reached Calcutta on the 12th. The following is a précis of the intelligence brought by this opportunity.

Her Majesty, the Queen, was well in health, and it is said, proposed a visit to the northern counties, which it was possible might be extended to Scotland.

The Queen Dowager has returned to England; and since her return, had shewn much good sense. The City of London having refused to present an Address to the Queen, the Queen Dowager refused to receive an Address from them. She had also declined giving Drawing-rooms, which had annoyed some who had intended to attend them to manifest their opposition to the Queen.

The Hereditary Prince of Russia had left England for the Continent. His Highness has visited every object worthy of attention in the British Metropolis, and acquired golden opinions by his urbanity and generosity. He allowed six hundred of the expatriated Poles, twelve shillings a week, during his stay in England.

The proceedings and position of Ministers it is difficult to comprehend from these papers. It is said that Lord John Russell and Lord Melbourne have refused to pledge themselves even to a course of progressive Reform; that they are anxious to resign the Government into the hands of the Conservatives; to accomplish which, a dissolution would be necessary; that there is talk of a more liberal Cabinet under Lords Durham and Northampton. It is very probable that no decisive change will be made during the present Session; and equally so, that some new negotiations, if not arrangements, will be made during the recess.

The Steam Question 'progresses.' The Court of Directors will send the Queen, an 800 ton Steamer, to Bengal, in September; and the Chingatra, to Bombay, on the 1st of August. Mr. Currie and the Committee have been busily pushing the Comprehensive Plan. Her Majesty's Government are prepared to give 100,000*l.* a year; and a letter has been sent to the Directors to say that the proposals of the Steam Committee are approved by Government, with the exception of limiting the duration of the contract to five years. It remains to be seen what course the Directors will take. If their resolution should be unfavourable, it is resolved to bring the whole subject before Parliament. A convention has been made between the French and English Governments, which provides that the correspondence between England and the East Indies shall be conveyed through France in plate iron or tin cases hermetically sealed, as it regards letters from India, or in sealed bags from England, under charge of a special messenger, to be forwarded from Marseilles to Alexandria, and vice versa, three times in the month in vessels of a hundred and sixty horse power.

Lord William Bentinck was at Paris so ill, that his life was at one time despaired of. The last accounts are more favourable. His Lordship appears to have resigned the representation of Glasgow, for which Mr. Oswald proposed himself as a candidate.

The Verona, of 1,000 tons, building by Messrs. Green and Co., of Blackwall, was to be fitted with Engines of thirty horse power, to assist her in calm, and was to leave England in September, under the command of Capt. Denry.

A British India Society has been formed in London, by some eminent philanthropists; and the ground upon which they rest their claims in public support, is the frequency of intemperate and the necessity of adopting some vigorous means for their prevention. It is a right laudable object; and no country ought to be without such a society. We fear, however, that their zeal will outrun their discretion, and their projects become neutralized both.

The 15th Hussars, with the son of the great Sir Walter Scott, as Lieut.-Col. is on its way to Bombay. Lord Viscount Jocelyn, the eldest son of the Earl of Roden, has also set out on a journey to India, to visit his maternal community.

It is stated that Lord Hill is about to resign the office of Commander-in-Chief, in which he will, in all probability, be succeeded by the Marquis of Anglesea. Major General Crompton, who was represented in some of our papers as likely to come out as Commander-in-Chief, comes out only on the staff. Lord Fitzroy Somerset is talked of as our new Commander-in-Chief. The Intelligence is almost too good to be true. With His Lordship among us, we should be alarmed by no contingency of events.

Lord Powis expired on the 16th May, in the 86th year of his age. His Lordship was in Calcutta, with his illustrious father, eighty-two years ago, when the foundation of this empire was laid at Plassey.

Mr. T. B. Macaulay has been elected Member of Parliament for Edinburgh, without opposition.

Mr. Abercromby, the Speaker, has been raised to the peerage, though by what title, it is difficult to say. One paper gives him the title of Lord Kinross; another, that of Lord Dunfermline. The election of a new Speaker occasioned a struggle, in which the Conservatives were beaten. Their candidate, Mr. Gusham, mastered 299 votes; the liberal candidate, Mr. Lafave, 317.

In the very important case of Stockdale against Hansard, the Lord Chief Justice Denman has given judgement for the plaintiff, in which the other judges agreed. Sir J. Littledale, Sir J. Patteson, and Sir J. T. Coleridge, declared their judgements at considerable length. The effect of this decision is, that it is no defence to action for libel to plead that the matter published was by order of the House of Commons—that while Parliament is privileged in all that takes place within its walls, and can publish documents for the use of its Members, its privilege does not extend to the publication of proceedings, and sale of them to the public.

The House of Commons has naturally taken up in earnest a decision which strikes at the root of its privileges; and appointed a Committee, consisting of the foremost men and the ablest lawyers on both sides the House, to enquire into the decision and to report thereon. Their names are—Mr. Attorney-General, Lord John Russell, Lord Viscount Howick, Lord Stanley, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. William Wynn, Mr. Warburton, Mr. Bernal, Mr. Esdaile, the Solicitor-General, Sir Edward Sugden, Mr. Goulburn, Mr. Pemberton, Dr. Lushington, the Solicitor-General for Ireland, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir William Follett, Mr. Taurer, the Lord-Advocate, Mr. Villiers, Sir George Strickland, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Mr. Sergeant Wilde, Mr. O'Connell, Sir George Clerk.

In reference to Jamaica, Ministers had brought in a Bill, founded on the principle of calling the Assembly again together, and giving them what might be called a fucus penitentior.

Mr. Hume, in consequence of his vote against Ministers, has received a request from the electors of Kilkenny, to resign; and this great champion of the responsibility of representatives to their constituents, has distinctly refused to do.

A Bill has been brought into Parliament by Lord John Russell, on the subject of National Education, but His Lordship remarked, that in consequence of erroneous opinions that had gone abroad, he felt bound to abandon it. The English are too much divided by sectarian animosities to allow any Minister, Conservative, Whig or Radical, to bring in a Bill that shall equally embrace the education of all.

In Canada every thing is quiet. In America the boundary question is almost forgotten. Both Governments appear to have united in postponing it, sine die, by agreeing to a measurement of the disputed lands!

The Thames Tunnel is rapidly progressing, and the most sanguine expectations are entertained of reaching low water mark, on the Middlesex shore, before the termination of the summer. The works have now progressed to within thirty-five feet of Trinity low water mark on the north side, and from the state of the shield and the external appearance of the excavation, it is believed that all danger has been surmounted.

Lieut. Crighton, R. N., the Manager of the Leith and London Steam Navigation Company, is now engaged with a plan for converting all the merchant steamers of the united kingdom into war steamers.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

A DUEL.

The Englishman of the 26th July, stated that a duel had been fought between Capt. MacNaghten and Mr. Hollings; this account we copied into the Chandrika, and we think it our duty to make some remarks upon that circumstance.

The English suppose themselves to be a brave, wise, ingenious, strong and virtuous people; and they, therefore, look upon the inhabitants of this country, particularly the Hindoos, as a weak and feeble body of men; but they are blind to the faults of their own conduct. Two persons are, perhaps, offended with each other; the one party challenges the other, and they fight a duel; sometimes the lives of both are lost; sometimes one of them is killed, or perhaps both are wounded; in this civilization or courage? It is truly surprising that a person who has been well educated from his childhood, and who has risen to a post of honour, and who has a family, should be so stupid as an insult offered by another, either by letter, or by word of mouth, or in some other way, and so compromise his anger as to risk his own life. Perhaps it may be said, that an insult deserves to be punished with death; yet in this case not only is his life exposed to danger; but he is endeavouring to destroy another, his own life may be lost, and his wife and children may be left destitute, so that by punishing them also. We Hindoos term this suicide; and there is no forgiveness for suicide, because no sin can be greater than this; for this reason, our Shastres again and again deprecate suicide, and direct the ruler to prevent it; but it is most astonishing thing that the English, who are rulers, should take no steps to prevent it. If he said, that when a duel is fought, it is not with the orders of the ruler, but is done in secret by those who are the slaves of passion; we reply, that we have heard, that, when a duel is fought, each of the individuals has two friends present as seconds. This, therefore, is not done in secret; and government might easily prevent it; otherwise it becomes liable to occur and disgrace. Ever since the English have governed this country, they have sought to prevent the evil Hindoo practice of Suttees. Had they not done this, they would have been despised by all other nations; and this, they considered, an act of base weakness. But this act of the Hindoos is in accordance with their Shastres. By this, the woman and her husband are cleansed from all sin, and received into heaven; and thus the relatives of the woman are rendered happy; and this becomes a ground of boasting amongst her connections; because the woman by this act has delivered three generations from misery. Such is the Shaster. Again, it is reasonable that the woman should thus die, because the husband is the wife's genius; and when once a widow, she is deprived of the pleasures of life; so that it is better for a Hindoo widow to die than to live. The rulers of this country looked upon this as an abominable act, and issued a law for the abolition of the Suttee. This they showed the superiority of the Christian religion, because it proved that as Christians, they would not endure such cruelty. But is dwelling permitted by the Christian's Bible? What cause for sorrow! Of these two gentlemen, he that lived in Calcutta was a learned man, and what he wrote was for the good of others; but the other, taking another view of it, and under the influence of passion, according to the custom of his country, on coming to town two or three years afterwards, kindled the extinguished flame, and compelled him to fight a duel. If he had not done so, he would have been slighted by his countrymen; but where is he to leave his family? They have no refuge. Yet to exonerate himself from the shame of his own countrymen, he takes leave of a beautiful wife, and disavowing all affection for his children, makes his will. Did he not then disregard the laws of his native land? The grief we felt on learning of this circumstance is indescribable. Who will not condemn in our opinion, that dwelling in a very cruel act; that it is a great crime, and that it ought to be prevented? The English have eleven many customs in their own land; and they are in the habit of arrogating many laws which they think are not good; thus about 15 years ago, forgery used to be punished with death, but this punishment has since been abolished. Let them now anxiously endeavour to abolish duelling altogether, otherwise what the Natives of this country say of Englishmen will be found to be true.—Chandrika.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Your editorial of the 1st instant appears to me to imply that Mr. Page has shewn all the Native Officers in Minsapore to be corrupt. This is not, however, the case. The only general accusation which he brings against the Native Officers of all the Courts of the district, is, that they grant copies of papers, filed with cases on unstamped, instead of on stamped paper. The 28th Reg. of 1814, A. D. directs that all parties to suits shall be furnished on unstamped paper, with unstamped copies of all papers filed with a case; and this is his fair, for otherwise how could any, except a particularly wealthy man, be able to appeal against the decision of a superior Court? To take copies of all papers in a small case, would cost about 100 Rs.; and where the proceedings chance to be voluminous, the expenditure would be reckoned by thousands. The delinquent Deputy Collector specified by Mr. Page, is attached in the office of the Special Deputy Collector, which is quite distinct from that of the Collector; and even his offence cannot, I think, be said to amount to corruption, unless the persons from whom he borrowed money are parties to a suit in his Court, for out of Court an officer of this class has not any more influence than his own poon. "Fool-ul-Itik," the other person named, is a Collectorate Amil, but never has, I think, been discharged from the Collectorate. Mr. Page, probably, means Mohammed Hossain, formerly a Serishtadar of the Collectorate, but long since discharged.

I address you merely in defence of the present Amil of the Collectorate, who, being ignorant of English, cannot defend themselves. Many of these, I believe, to be honest men; they are about eighty in number; and some are, probably, corrupt; even eighty Europeans taken indiscriminately from any public office at home, would not all be found uncorrupt. As facts are useful in argument, I mention, that when the late Treasurer, Jagobchunder Chatterjee, was called on to give security, which he could not for some time deposit, several of the most respectable Mooktears of the district came forward, and elbowed together, to make up the amount of security required, to prevent his being discharged. Would this have been done had the man been dishonest? He has, I am happy to say, been promoted to a Deputy Collectorship, and has been succeeded by Durgachunder Chatterjee, who has served Government faithfully in the district of Cuttack for more than 30 years. I am very much misinformed, if the Collectorate Serishtadar, Fuddum Loohn Mundal, be not an honest man; and I could mention others. Were a thorough enquiry made in my district, I think it would be found that the:

greater part of the bribes paid by others, go into the pockets of their own Mookhtars. What do you think of clients giving money to the head Native Assistants of Attorneys, to have their business speedily brought before the Supreme Court? If you doubt this fact, ask some Attorney of your acquaintance in large practice, whether I am correct. If true of Calcutta clients, how much more easily duped must Mofussilites be?

I am, Sir,

Yours obedient servant,

DARSSON.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sir,—Although knowing from experience, that in the majority of instances, oaths fail to secure the veracity of witnesses, I cannot concur with you in the propriety of abolishing them altogether.

For the edification of those who are so eager to rush from one extreme to another, I will relate two occurrences which have come within my own experience.

Holding a conversation some years ago with a Native of the Rajeshy district, who has held various high and responsible offices under Government, I remarked upon the vanity of witnesses in the district where I was then learning to do justice. "Yes," replied my friend, "it is very shocking. Why, in this district one may buy as many witnesses as one could wish, for 4 annas each, but in my Native district you cannot get one for less than 8 annas." Six years ago I was placed in charge of the Khua Mebala of a district, where the Collector says, as to have known the name, but not the man, of Jumna and Jaganath. There had been no adjustment of the arrears for 15 years. To increase the confusion, the arrears due by individual ryots, carried forward from the Jumna small buyer of one year to that of another, did not correspond in any one instance. It was necessary to make an adjustment, but on liberal terms. The surest method of attaining the object appeared to be, to require the head men of the villages, who had been nominally rejected, but who had fortunately assisted the Tehsildar in his collections, to attend with the ryots, and afford their evidence as to the reality of the balance, and the ability of the parties to liquidate it. I told each head man at the commencement, that I had no desire to be over-strict, and that I was desirous to maintain their respectability among their ryots. I did not intend to test their evidence by oath. I found the process very satisfactory in several villages. One head man, however, made several statements which I had good reason to believe were incorrect. After warning him several times that I must put him upon oath, he still persisted in making false statements. My Cutcherry was held under the fly of a tent with the kumans raised, so as to afford shade for a great number of people. In presence of them all, I directed the oath to be placed in his hands; and after warning him against perjury, and reminding him that all the parties in attendance were his neighbours and connexions, &c. &c., I asked him whether the statements he had made were true. He attempted to answer, but before he could speak, he fainted—he was carried out and restored; and after a time was brought back again, but fainted again, and it was not till the following day that I could go on with his evidence. When the man fainted, a murmur ran through the crowd, and some remarked that it was no use attempting to deceive the Sahiblogne. I am pretty sure no one attempted to deceive me on that estate after the occurrence. I am not confident that the process would have produced the same effect in the Sudder Cutcherry; for I believe the circumstance of the enquiry being held in the estate where the individual was known to every person, and where the truth must have been known to many, had very great influence. But it proves that people may be induced to tell the truth upon oath, where it might not be considered at all derogatory to tell a simple untruth. I should, therefore, prefer, that a wider discretion should be allowed to presiding officers, respecting the administering of, or dispensing with, oaths. Although Sec. 6, Reg. L. of 1803, does direct that officers shall exercise great caution, and shall satisfy themselves that the rank or caste of a deponent does really require that his declaration should be admitted, I believe that in practice, officers are generally guided by the respectability of a deponent. But respectability as a quality that is scarcely to be defined, except by negatives. I believe a witness on the trial of Thurtell and others, explained that it was implied by keeping a gig. Probably, if the law relating to oaths shall be modified to suit the practice, the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut will construe it, "that quality of mind which renders a solemn declaration a better security for the veracity of a deponent than an oath."

Yours truly,

J. K. R.

THE CHURCH AND EDUCATION.—At the February meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (as reported in the Record) the secretary stated, that a memorial had been received on the subject of the tracts published and circulated by the Society, signed by seventy-four incumbents and curates in the county of Somerset, which memorial was read, and was to the purport following:—That the memorialists, being many of the members of the Society, and all of them of the Church of the Established Church, took a deep interest in the welfare of the Society; but that they had, with considerable pain, observed that the tone of some of its publications is not in accordance with the holy doctrine of truth, as explained, illustrated, and defended in the homilies, articles, and liturgy of the Church. That, while thankful for the improved spirit of some of its tracts, recently put forth, they were of opinion, that the Society's publications are still infused with those erroneous and dangerous notions, which, by their odiousness, they had prompted, when the diligence, to banish and drive away. And the memorialists, as a reason for feeling a more especial interest in the matter of these publications, that, in the education of the lower orders under their charge, they were required to adopt the Society's tracts exclusively, wherever our scheme was in connection with the National Society. In the course of the debate which ensued, (as usual, an angry one, the Evangelical party being overpowered by numbers, if not by arguments), the Rev. R. Moore declared, that "thousands of the members of the Church of England were deterred from joining the Society, by a perception that the tracts do not give sufficient prominence to the living truths of the Gospel, while many of the tracts are very corrupt. What they wanted, was, to have the leading divines in the Church plainly stated." The Rev. J. E. Fryer, in reply, admitted that, if the alterations desired by the Essex memorialists were made (that is, in favour of Evangelical doctrines,) "ten members would leave the Society for one that would join it." Now, it is while these scenes are taking place month after month at the very bosom of the Church of England, and while clergy men are openly protesting against the anti-scriptural character of the instruction promulgated by the Christian Knowledge Society, and mixed up with education in all the schools of the National Society, that we are threatened with the new statute of Denominational Education, by which the Church seeks to monopolize the education of the country!—At this same meeting, a clergyman having deprecated theological discussion, which he thought would be better left in the hands of the clergy, Mr. W. W. Hall pronounced against its being assumed in that room, that theological discussions, belonged to the clergy alone. "He utterly denied that the clergy alone had a right to decide matters of doctrine. So far from the laity not having an equal right and an equal interest in the clergy in deciding matters of doctrine in our Church, they had, in fact, a greater right and a greater interest; they were more in number, and less liable to the passions of the moment of the doctrines, or so to press one doctrine as not to leave sufficient influence to another; and, if they were not allowed to decide on matters of doctrine in that room, they must do so elsewhere." This bold layman added, that, "though it was degrading to touch upon, we must express his belief, that there were at present those who wished to set up some other standard of doctrine than the word of God alone." Par.

BALLOT FOR THE LAYING OF ST. THOMAS'S STONEWALL.—The High-Church Tory party obtained a signal defeat on Wednesday last, on the election of a minister to this parish, despite the recommendation of the Bishop of Peterborough and other Church dignitaries. The living, worth upwards of 3000*l.* a year, is in the gift of St. Thomas's Hospital. The candidates were the Rev. T. M. Wetherell, M.A., a nephew of Sir C. Wetherell; and the Rev. William Drey, B.D., the struggling afternoon lecturer of Baymwood parish, and curate at Lambeth. Mr. Wetherell proposed Mr. Wetherell as especially acceptable, as the treasurer, being resident in the hospital, attends the church. Mr. Lindsay observed that the reason assigned did not apply, as the treasurer was invariably absent on the Sabbath at his house at Woodford. Mr. J. Wilson, of Highbury, proposed Mr. Drey; upon which a ballot (yes, a ballot in the court-room of the once Tory hospital of St. Thomas) took place, which closed at four o'clock; when the numbers were declared by the president, Sir John Cowan, Bart.:—Rev. Mr. Deay, 57; Rev. Mr. Whettersell, 53; majority for Mr. Deay, 4.—Fal.

PRESIDENT STATE OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.—It appears that the total number of meetings, in the whole United Kingdom is 419, that of these there are 280 in which they meet for worship once on each Lord's Day, that in 141 meetings they only assemble once on that day, and that in fourteen of them even that once is occasionally omitted. That of those 419 congregations, there are 298 led by any minister, leaving only 121 supplied with ministers. That the total number of ministers in the whole society is only 213, and that of these 162 are women, leaving only 51, or about one-third, men.—Inquirer.

THE EVANGELICAL FRIENDS AT MANCHESTER have appointed Messrs. I. Crowdon and W. Boulton as "elders, bishops, or pastors," and have chosen four deacons. The following are the doctrines of this church, as stated in the trust-deed of their chapel:—"That the Scriptures were given by divine inspiration, and are the revelation of the will of God to man, in all things necessary to his eternal happiness; that they are the rule of faith and practice; and nothing which is not found therein is to be regarded as an article of faith, or as requisite to salvation. That God is revealed through the Holy Scriptures in the character of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; that in the Holy Scriptures we are taught, that man fell by sin from the state of holiness in which he was created; that his posterity are born in the same fallen condition; and thus, being by nature prone to evil, and at enmity against God, all the world is guilty before him. That all mankind are to be invited to accept the salvation which is freely offered in the gospel of Christ. That the Son of God, by whom the world was created, and by whom all things consist, was made flesh, and died upon the cross, a propitiation for the sins of the whole world,—that through his perfect righteousness, and atoning sacrifice, all who repent and believe in him are delivered from condemnation; and being justified by faith, are made heirs of eternal life, and receive the gift of the Holy Ghost as the earnest of their inheritance. That, being thus made alive unto God by a new creation in Christ Jesus unto good works, the believers delight in the holy law of God, take the precepts of the gospel as his rule of life, and seeks to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."—Christ, &c.

AT THE MANCHESTER MEETING OF THE TOWN SOCIETY, for the exact time I could not read a paper, furnished by the coadjutors (Mr. S. Elenker), one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in the town. It stated, that at the meeting of the justices at quarter sessions, on the day of the meeting, the usual report had been presented to them, from which it appeared, that, compared with the preceding year, there had been 1234 fewer commitments to gaol, and that there were then in custody 230 prisoners less than at the like period in 1837. The magistrates were wholly unable, from any local circumstances, to account for the diminution in crime. Mr. Crowdon, having read the information, put the question to the meeting, "Has the Town Mission had any light to do with this matter?" The nature of the response may be conjectured from the following statement:—"The superintendent of this mission has stated, that, before the society began its labours, the district called 'Little Ireland' was in such a state of immorality and imbecility, that it was often dangerous to pass through it. Frequently have the missionaries been forcibly turned out of the houses; yet they persevered. Kindness has overcome all opposition; and patient continuance in well doing' has been crowned with much success. Already one-half of the police force has been withdrawn from the district."—Ibid.

THE PARISH IN DISPUTE.—The Rev. J. Smith, late editor of the Church of Scotland Magazine, and at present parish missionary under the Rev. Dr. Black, of the Barony parish, Glasgow, has been appointed by the Presbytery of Aberdeen, to be interim minister of said parish while the present lawsuit is pending.—Scottish Pilot.

SABBATH LABOUR AND ECONOMY FOR THE WORKMAN.—A letter addressed by Dr. Chalmers, to Sir A. Agnew, contains the following important passage:—"It is a well-known economic law, that even in infant or in rapidly-progressing countries, every addition to the quantity of work is attended by a corresponding reduction in the rate of wages; and this will infallibly happen, whether the increase arises from an additional number of workmen, or the increase of number of work-days. If ever the seventh day shall come into competition with the other six, for common week-day employment, it will as effectually overtake the labour market, as if a seventh man were to come into competition with every six men all over the empire, and so bring down universally the recompense for labour."—Christ, &c.

THE NEGRO AND HIS BIBLE.—Mr. Joseph Wheeler writes from Kingston, Jamaica, Dec. 8, 1838.—"I called, with Mr. Thoms, on an old friend of age, his woolly hair white as snow. He was reading a bible, one that had been given him from the society. He is crippled with accident, but his eyes are not dim with age. He said: 'Who gave him that bible, gave him his life. He pray to God for them. It was all his comfort. I read,' said he, 'a chapter; and then God talks to me: I shut my book, and then I talk with God.'"—Bible Society's Monthly Extracts.

ASSAM.—LETTER OF MESSRS. BROWN AND CUTTER, DATED MAY 10, 1839. Missionaries for the Brahmaputra Valley.

The following communication, with others of like import, would ordinarily solicit the attention of those especially who might be desirous on the question of consecrating their personal services to the Foreign Missionary cause. From such, we still hope, it will receive all due regard. To sustain and carry forward efficiently the missions already established, will require a continual and rapid increase of the number of labourers. Our brethren in the field are few, and their labours painfully accumulated. Stations full of promise are presented on every hand, but there are none to occupy them. Other stations, now flourishing, will be soon vacated, unless new reinforcements are sent to replace the veterans of disease and death.

At the present crisis, however, the appeal from our brethren in Assam may be considered as directly addressed to those on whom the missions depend for their pecuniary supplies. The fact should be distinctly understood and remembered by all the friends of missions, that unless the contributions to the treasury be increased in a much greater ratio than they have been since the necessities of the Board were made known, the missions cannot be supported, even on their present scale. It should also be borne in mind, that the increased demand for pecuniary aid does not originate in any transient exigency, but in the gradual and almost unavoidable expansion of the missions; and the question submitted to our Christian liberality, is, not whether we shall attempt by judicious culture to quicken in early maturity the fruits so generously set, but whether by our urgent they be sufficed to fail away and perish.

Having ascertained that the English Baptist Missionaries have determined on vacating Assam, as a missionary field, in favour of their American brethren, we feel impelled to address you on the importance of commencing operations throughout this province with the least possible delay.

You are aware of the wide extent and variety of tribes who inhabit the Brahmaputra Valley, and the many advantages it possesses as a missionary field. Situated as we are, under the full sanction of the English Government, in fact encouraged and supported by some of its highest functionaries, the missionary is exempt from those embarrassments and dangers, to which, from the opposition of the ruling powers, he is subject in most localities.

The climate we believe to be generally healthy, except in particular situations, where exposure to the influence of extensive jungles produces a tendency to fever during the rainy months.

The population is sparse, when compared with that of Bengal, though it is probably much more dense, on the average, than that of Arracan, or the British possessions in Burmah.

We shall, at present, only point out a few of the principal situations, to which we think missionaries ought to be immediately sent.

1. Another missionary to the Shyans, to reside at Sillim, or some other village in the vicinity of Sadiya.

2. A missionary to the Singphos, to be associated with brother Brown, either at Jaijpur or Nivon, on the Barl Dihing, in favour perhaps another to labour among the Singphos, near Sadiya, making his principal station at Bise, on the No Dihing, but three days journey above this place.

3. A missionary to the Nagas, to join brother Brown at Jaijpur, until a more eligible station can be fixed upon. The Nagas are the same tribe as the Khyems of Burmah, and must be very numerous, although we have no certain information whether they all speak any language.

4. A missionary to the Miris, or Abors inhabiting the plains of Assam, speaking the same language as the Abors who inhabit the mountains between here and Tibet.

5. A missionary to labour among the Assamese, in the territories belonging to the Ahom Rajas.

6. A missionary to the Assamese to be stationed at Jorhat. This place has long been the seat of the Assam Rajas, and is considered the capital of Upper Assam. It has a considerable population, and the country around will afford ample room for missionary labours.

7. Two missionaries to Guwahati, the capital of Lower Assam, and the residence of the Governor General's Agent for the north eastern frontier, a situation well held by Capt. Jenkins, a warm friend to missions, through whose instrumentality our attention was first called to Assam. He has ever manifested the warmest kindness to us, and has recently made a donation to the mission of five hundred rupees, in addition to previous donations of two thousand rupees, received since the establishment of the mission. It is Capt. Jenkins' wish that not less than two missionary families should be sent to Gweru, and as it is a post of great importance, we hope the Board will appoint the two first missionaries they send, to that place. It has hitherto been occupied by the Serampore missionaries; but we believe that very few, if any, conversions have taken place among the natives. Brother Robinson informs me that there are a mission chapel and bungalow now ready for the reception of the missionaries who will come out.

There are many other large towns in Lower Assam which we should like to mention, as Nongst, Guwahati, &c., which will afford extensive missionary fields, but they can be supplied afterwards.

8. A missionary will be needed among the Khasis, in case Mr. Lish, of the Serampore society, leaves his station.

9. The Garos are another interesting race of mountaineers, amongst whom we hope a mission will be commenced as soon as practicable. We would say the same of the Mikirs and Lalongs, to whose languages brethren Ray and Robinson have heretofore devoted some attention.

10. We cannot forbear again bringing forward a request which we have already made to you, for the appointment of a missionary for the special object of teaching and superintending schools in the villages around Sadia, and in the neighbourhood of Suklira, on the opposite side of the river. Very few indeed of the people can read, and there is no prospect that any schools will be established among them, except such as are taught by missionaries, for many years to come.

In view of the wants of the different tribes we have mentioned, we think that twelve additional missionaries is the least number that could with propriety be sent to commence operations in so wide a field. In the midst of such varied obstacles and discouragements as we have to contend with in a country like this, it is in the highest degree desirable that there should be concentration of effort, and that all missionaries in the same field should be of one denomination, and acting under the instructions of one Board. In this way only can we hope for that combined, harmonious, and systematic effort all engaged in the work, which is so necessary to success. We would, therefore, dear brethren, earnestly suggest the propriety of an immediate concentration of your efforts upon this extended field, which God in his providence has now given into your hands. We know no more inviting field in the missionary world—no field where we could work so much satisfaction to labour and die in this precious cause. But the solitary effort, the few men on the ground, are but a drop in the ocean—they are swallowed up and lost amid the widespread desolation and darkness; and unless the field is speedily supplied with more labourers, we fear the cause will languish, while heathenism continues to spread and strengthen itself, for years to come. May God in mercy look upon us, and send us help, and bring salvation to this wretched and long neglected land.—American Baptist Missionary Magazine.

SOUTH AFRICA.—The relations of the Colony with the Bordering Tribes are not yet satisfactory. On this subject we quote from the "Watchman," which paper is well informed on the condition of the Colony. After alleging the continued depredation of the Caffres along the whole line of the frontier, and the treacherous hostility of many of the Hottentots themselves, it is stated—

"Our apprehension of coming evil, excited by the consideration of such stubborn facts as these, is strengthened by the conduct of the Government. Two very important documents have appeared in the "Government Gazette."

"The first is a copy of a Treaty which the Governor has entered into with the Amangweni Tribe. It is in evidence, that the Lieutenant-Governor Stockenström held the opinion, that if this tribe had joined the hostile Caffres in the late war, the ruin of the Colony would have been inevitable; and also, that it was solely owing to the teaching of the Missionary, William Shaw, and his colleagues, that it was preserved in friendly alliance with the Colony. The new Governor, Napier, is endeavouring to attach more firmly to British interests the powerful tribe, by entering into a league "offensive and defensive" with its ruling Chiefs. What does this fact indicate?—that his minute personal examination of the state of things on the frontier has convinced him of the policy of guarding against the threatening storm.

"The second document to which we advert, is a Proclamation of the Governor, inviting the Emigrant Farmers to return to the Colony. It also is especially deserving of notice.—Invited to adopt the measures which had been strenuously urged upon him, his Excellency uses the language of conciliation; and assures them, that if they will come back, all their real grievances shall be redressed. The important paper points as we judge, to the same conclusion as the former; and strengthens the presumption that the Government is aware that the welfare and safety of the Colony are really endangered.

"On the whole, setting the representations of party aside, and looking only at independent evidence as is afforded by official returns, proceedings of Courts of Justice, and the acts of Government, we are compelled to admit that there is too much reason to conclude that the Colony on the Caffre Frontier is placed in critical and trying circumstances. While the Caffres are evidently in an unsettled state, the Colony has lost much of its former strength. The serious defection among the Hottentots proves that they are not to be depended upon in any future struggle; and the help of the Emigrant Farmers is no longer at hand; they have not only impoverished the Colony by withdrawing their cattle and property, but recently lessened its means of defence; for whatever may be their faults, the Dutch-Afrikaner Farmers are undoubtedly to be classed among the bravest and most fearless of men."

The subject of the Emigrant Farmers is noticed at pp. 319, 324, 474, 475, 476, 556, of our last Volume. Dr. Hallbeck thus speaks of them, on his late visit to the eastern parts of the Colony:

"We saw a caravan of twenty-four waggonen, with large herds of cattle, belonging to a company of Dutch Farmers, who were making for the Interior. This emigration has been going on for upwards of a year; and it is computed that 4,800 or 5,000 persons have thus left the Colony. This rage for emigration, it is feared, will be attended with disastrous consequences, both to themselves and to the Native Tribes: for they seem to carry with them an hereditary contempt for the rights of the natives—whom they consider themselves entitled to shoot, like wild beasts, if they offer any opposition to their encroachments; and to keep or sell their children for slaves. Government, unable to recall the Emigrants or to prevent others from following them, appear desirous to cultivate amicable relations with them, that they may find them allies, and not enemies, should hostilities re-commence; at least, I am at a loss to account in any other way for their forbearance towards them. Yet, whatever the designs and plans of man may be, we would vainly hope that these remarkable changes may be finally overruled to the execution of God's kingdom."

Whatever may be the character of some of the Hottentots, the great body of that people deserve public commendation and relief. The Committee of the Aborigines' Protection Society thus plead their cause:—

"Some efforts in favour of this oppressed but deserving class of Aborigine Natives have been made during several past years; especially through the medium of Missionary Institutions, formed expressly for the protection and religious improvement of the Aborigines in the Colony. To these has been, unexpectantly, attributed the preservation from utter extinction of this ill-fated race."

"The testimony of several highly-respectable witnesses, including some who were not easily convinced of the attitude of the Hottentots for any kind of culture, is conclusive as to the success of the experiment of these Settlements. No reasonable doubt can, therefore, be entertained, as to the eligibility of encouraging the formation of other Settlements for the same class of Aborigines of the Cape Colony. Such Settlements cannot but awaken a powerful interest in their favour, when looked on as the means of giving a place and a home to the forlorn remnant of a once numerous and happy pastoral people—as opening new markets for British manufactures—as constituting localities for the direct efforts of Christian instruction, without which, all attempts in civilisation must prove abortive—as raising up a class of Natives who may prove, under the Divine Blessing, of immediate and extensive benefit to the yet-savage tribes beyond our Colony, and especially to their fellow-countrymen within the Colonial Boundary—and as forming a valuable preventative to those mutual losses of property and subsequent retaliations, which have for so many years irritated both the Colonial and Caffre Farmers.

"In no part of the world, where European Colonies have been formed, have the Aborigines greater reason to complain of cruelty, oppression, and injustice, than have the Hottentots of South Africa. Once the free, the numerous, the independent occupants of the soil, they have gradually perished before the European settlers; and the remnant of this persecuted Nation, unable to retreat on their more-powerful and warlike neighbours (the Caffres and other Tribes who were residing beyond the country which they once possessed), have degenerated into the feeble, scattered, and impoverished servents of the worst masters of the land of their fathers.

"The Hottentots have not only been driven from their paternal inheritance, but left without a home. Even their right in the soil, once exclusively belonging to their race, has been so far 'devoted' that, as late as the year 1836, it is stated, in the law passed by General Bourke for their relief, that doubts existed upon the competency of the Hottentots and other free persons of colour (the recent possessors, be it remembered, of the whole soil) to purchase or possess land in the Colony. It is not then surprising that their numbers should have diminished. South Africa once counted at least 200,000 Aborigine Hottentots, but they now do not exceed 32,000."—Atlas, Register.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY AND AFRICA.—Ever since our negro population have been blessed with freedom, the correspondent of the American Baptist Register, many of the members and inquirers connected with the Baptist churches have felt that an obligation has rested upon them to send the gospel to the hand of their fathers. Consequently, at the missionary universities which have just been held on the north side of the island, this subject has principally occupied the attention of speakers and hearers. Very interesting meetings were held at Stewart-town on the 4th, 5th, and 6th, at St. Ann's Bay on the 8th. The Rev. Messrs. Kailib, Abbott, Dexter, and Clark delivered addresses on the importance of immediate, united, and fervent prayer for divine direction, this plan might be formed and carried into operation to impart the gospel to the negro tribe in the interior of western Africa. Several negro brethren, deacons of the churches, supported the resolution with much earnestness of manner and propriety of expression. Several declared their willingness and desire to go in that far distant land. The Baptist churches in this island are able to support a mission. They have among them men of piety and zeal, with capacities for the reception of learning, whose minds are bent on this object. The subject, we believe, will be fully discussed at the approaching association of Baptist ministers and churches, and ardently do we hope that the gospel, which has effected so mighty a change in our own peasantry, may before long be proclaimed in the heart of Africa, and be productive of the like glorious effects on the millions of the negro race who are here living and dying without God and without hope.—Christ Ad.

THE ADMINISTRATION AND FOREIGN MISSIONS.—We have recently learned that the U. S. Consul at the Sandwich Islands has been removed from office under the following circumstances. For years he has been violently opposed to the missionaries, and has used every means in his power to thwart their benevolent efforts among the natives. During the recent visit to this country of Mr. Richards, the missionaries, he represented the case to the President, who promptly removed the offender from office, and appointed a Sabbath-school teacher in his place.—Worcester Palladium.

EDUCATION.

ENLARGEMENT OF STEEPY COLLEGE.—The Committee of Steepy College have called the attention of their friends and the religious public at large, to the state of that institution. The supply of pious educated ministers in the Baptist denomination, it is notorious, has long been inadequate to the demand for them. Not more than twenty or twenty-five sent out each year by the whole of the Colleges to fill the places of seventy or eighty pastors who are annually removed by death. In consequence, Missions Societies are without agents; voices of penitents without pastors; and new fields of labour left desolate. The committee have been compelled for a long time past to negative most promising applications, and thus practically to exclude from the Christian ministry many whom they feel persuaded God would have blessed, just because they have not had accommodation and funds sufficient to receive and support them. In the hope of correcting this evil, some of these evils, it was determined last year to enlarge the premises at Steepy, so that the Institution might admit six additional students. This enlargement has been effected at a cost of $750, of which only $311 have been collected. So that on this single account the Institution is in arrears $444. We understand that the College is in a most delightful state of harmony, and that the students spend considerable portions of time in devotional exercises with one another.—Christ Ad.

METROPOLITAN COMMERCIAL SCHOOL.—The Bishop of London has established a school at the west end, for the instruction of the children of the middle classes. A building has been erected near Soho-square. The committee, consisting of the Bishop of London, the Deans of Chichester and Westminster, and the clergy of the neighbourhood, have decided that the system shall comprise the truths and duties of Christianity, English, Latin, French, writing, linear drawing, arithmetic and elements of navigation, including mensuration, history, geography, elements of natural history and philosophy, and vocal music. The building is capable of accommodating from 400 to 500 scholars. The Bishop and the Dean of Chichester will examine the scholars each week alternately. The school was opened on Monday week.—Ibid.

SCIENTIFIC.

'BORING FOR WATER THROUGH GRANITE.' by Frederick Holland, communicated by A. Fellat, A. Inst. C. E. A hole, 6 feet wide and 17 feet deep was first dug, and a wooden cylinder lined with bricks inserted. Two pieces of cast-iron pipe 8 feet in length and 8 inches in diameter, turned smooth at both ends, and united by a wrought iron hoop ring, so that when the whole number of pipes were driven, a continuous pipe perfectly cylindrical both on the inside and out was formed. Nine lengths of pipe were connected and driven, and then the boring commenced, and continued through a hard species of rock granite, having all the component parts, but not the compactness of granite. The boring was continued to a depth of 175 feet, and the supply of water has been regular, at the rate of from 40 to 50 gallons per minute.—Athenaeum.

PNEUMATIC TELEGRAPH.—A model of a pneumatic telegraph, proposed by Mr. Crowley, has been lately added to the interesting collection at the Polytechnic Institution. The general introduction of railways, and the speed of railway travelling, seems to require that some means of communication between stations and stations, by night as well as by day, should be established, to guard against the collision of express trains, and other accidents. For this purpose, hydraulic and electro-magnetic telegraphs have been suggested, but we are not aware that either have been adopted; and now a pneumatic telegraph is offered. Atmospheric air is the conducting agent employed. The air is isolated by a tube, connected from one station to another; one extremity of the tube is connected with a gas-holder, or other collapse vessel, as a reservoir, to compensate for any diminution or increase of volume, arising from compression or from changes in the temperature of the air in the tube, and for supplying any casual loss by leakage. The other extremity of the tube terminates with a pressure index. Thus, if any certain degree of compression be produced and maintained in the reservoir at one station, the same degree of compression will speedily extend to the opposite station, where it will become visible to an observer by the index. Thus (says Mr. Crowley) with ten weights, producing ten different degrees of compression, distinguished from each other numerically, and having the index at the opposite station marked by corresponding figures, any telegraphic numbers may be transmitted, referring in the manual sign to a code of signals. The only experience in the transmission of atmospheric telegraphs through duct tubes, which applies particularly to this subject, may be referred to at three railway establishments—viz. Edinburgh, Liverpool, and Euston Square, London. In these establishments, air-tubes, from one mile and a quarter to two miles in length, have been employed, for the purpose of giving notice when a train of carriages is ready to be drawn up the inclined plane by the stationary engine at the summit, so that it may, without delay, be put in motion. This notice is communicated by blowing a current of air through the tube at the foot of the inclined plane, and sounding an organ-pipe, a whistle, or an alarm-bell at the stationary engine. This operation has been regularly performed from two to four years, without one single failure or disappointment. Mr. Crowley also states, that a trial was made with a tube of one inch in diameter, very nearly two miles in length, returning upon itself, so that both ends of the tube were brought into one place;—the compression applied at one end, was equal to a column of seven inches of water; and the effect on the index at the other end appeared in fifteen seconds of time.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BIOGRAPHY OF JOSEPH LANCASTER.—Died at New York, October 23, 1839, Joseph Lancaster, the philanthropist, and founder of the British System of Education, in the 60th year of his age. This eminently useful man was the son of humble but pious parents, his father having been a soldier in the foot-guards. Under the influence of personal religion, the natural benevolence of his son's mind was excited on behalf of the poor neglected children that surrounded their residence in the Borough Road, Southwark; he resolved, therefore, to open a school for their benefit; his father gave the school-room rent-free, and Joseph fitted up the forms and desks himself, and before he was eighteen he had ninety children under his care, most of whom were so poor as to require gratuitous instruction. This was in 1786, a period of scarcity as well as of general ignorance; and necessarily, that fruitful mother of useful discovery, prompted him to make experiments in education with a view to its economical extension.

His early attracted the notice of the Duke of Bedford and Lord Somersville, and in the year 1785, George the Third, with his Queen, Charlotte, gave Mr. Lancaster a long and gracious audience, on which occasion the King uttered the most patriotic sentiment that ever fell from his lips: "I wish that every poor child in my dominions may be able to read his Bible." Mr. Lancaster's principles, as a Quaker nonconformist, were not overlooked on this occasion. "The highest duty of hope," says he, "is owed to me, by the highest hands, if I could conscientiously join the church of England, but no good-will to the wish of my beloved sovereign and patron, George the Third, could induce me to sacrifice conscience, nor did he wish it at such an expense, nor did he take the least umbrage at my unobedient choice;" this was demonstrated by the liberal subscription of £100. per annum from the King, which was followed by Her Majesty's subscription, and that of twelve other members of the royal family. Mr. Lancaster's new system of mutual instruction was now before the public, and general attention was awakened to the subject of popular education by his labours.

In the short period of four years, from 1807 to 1811, he travelled, in various parts of the kingdom, nearly 7,000 miles, and lectured to nearly 50,000 persons, and gave such an impulse to public benevolence, that 25,000 children were provided with instruction. Such efforts were likely to arouse the slumbering Church, whose champions had hitherto maintained that education was not needed by the lower classes; but as the judgement of the country was against that strange position, it became necessary to establish, at the close of 1811, "The National School Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church."

But while the cause of liberal unsectarian education had made such progress through the labours of Mr. Leicester, it must be confessed that some peculiarities of his character greatly impeded its progress; he entertained very exaggerated ideas of his own ability to manage every thing pertaining to the Royal Lancasterian System, and by his determination to administer the financial as well as the educational department, he at length compelled his friends to quarrel with him, and to secure the object, to remove the instrument who had been so eminently useful in founding the new system of general instruction.

Thus while the Duke of Kent, Sussex, and Bedford stood by their colleague, and with their generous associates Lord Brougham, Mr. Hailey, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. William Allen, &c., founded the British and Foreign School Society, Mr. Lancaster imagined that he could conduct a seminary for the education of the sons of the wealthy in the higher walks of learning, from the same principles. He, therefore, in 1810, took Schrader House, Liver Street, for his new establishment, and issued advertisements that were sufficiently pompous and inflated. As might be expected, the project failed, a bankruptcy ensued, and the man who had been the favoured associate of princes was, from his uncompromising spirit, in want of bread.

After spending several years under this humiliating cloud, he left England for the United States in 1818, and he was received by our American brethren with great distinction, so that a vote was moved by Mr. Bassett, in the House of Representatives, "That Joseph Lancaster, the friend of learning and of man, be admitted to a seat within the House of Representatives."

During the ten years he resided in the R. P. office, many opportunities of usefulness opened before him, and much good resulted from his labours, but his habitual want of peace was a weighty burden to the estate to which he had devoted his life. In 1824 he visited Canada, and was received with marked kindness by the authorities. Lord Selkirk, the Hon. Mr. Knox and Mr. McTear, the latter of whom was his friend, had been in the West, and were anxious to have him carry forward his experience in the R. P. office. He was accordingly involved in an election quarrel with Mr. Speaker Ferguson, and some of his liberal friends, who threatened Joseph Lumsden with the suspension of the annual grant, unless he would break his promise and not vote for the liberal candidate. This provoked him to write a letter, in which he compelled him to suspend his assistance for wanted people.

His lamented death was the result of an accident in the streets of New York, where he was run over on the 22d of last October, and leaving him little time to get well, he very happily died the next day, in the fullness of his faith. His many Christian friends testify that his character had rapidly matured for a lifetime of work. There had been an angelic discernment in him for some weeks, so that when the accident was likely to prove mortal, he rejoiced in the love of God, and died full of faith in the blood of Jesus.

Although he had great defects of character, to which we have referred, yet, he was doubtless an instrument raised up by God, to accomplish a great and good work. He was a man of simple life and habits and no pretensions. He had a deep penetration into the character of others, expected a powerful influence over the affections of his friends, and possessed an enthusiasm for right principles, well adapted to carry the multitudes with him. Two of his old friends contemplate a longed-for journey of his life, which will, doubtless, interest the public; but this brief notice is written by one who derived no small advantage from his friendship in early life, and who desires to emulate his philanthropy and devotedness. —Conn. Messenger.

BISHOP TIMLINE'S GRATITUDE TO PITT.—On the death of that minister, a meeting was convened at Mr. Pitt's house of all his friends and admirers. Mr. Wiberforce, who was the first to rise, and who, as all the others then present, held a host of Mr. Pitt's, proposed that they should agree to burn the evidences of the debt due to them, that the nation might not become acquainted with the embarrassed state of Mr. Pitt's affairs. All present agreed to this proposition, except one; that one was wealthy Bishop Timeline, who owed all his enormous riches to Mr. Pitt's favour. This eminent prelate declared: "he said he could not well afford to make the sacrifice, but that if he might take Mr. Pitt's library, he would burn the bond he held. This was agreed to; and there sat there all the humble wretches destroyed. Every one of them, however, was so much indebted to Mr. Pitt, that the only application should have emanated from the Bishop, and not from Mr. Wiberforce. Bishop Timeline died earth, it said much more than a million.—Lucifer."

TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN FRANCE—Mr. E. C. D. Griffin, who was in France a few months since, in a letter to John H. Coker son Philippe, a Briton, and entering France, I expected to do nothing, as my ignorance of the French language would prevent my approaching most of the influential men. However, having received from the French Consul General, in the United States of America, a letter of introduction to the Aïd-ah-kan, son of the person of the king, I enclosed it in his address, soon after my arrival in Paris. I received an immediate answer, saying, that His Majesty would see me through my minister, Gen. Cien, who, with great readiness and promptitude, soon made me the necessary arrangements for my visit. I left Paris at half-past five. I was introduced by him at the Tuilleries, first to the queen, and then to the king, who, with a dozen ladies in waiting, were seated around a table, engaged in various occupations, the conversation being all for the benefit of the poor. But the king and the princess addressed me in English, the latter making me feel generous to give to temperance, which she said was a life's philanthropic effort. The king was not in the apartment when we arrived, but soon entered, when Gen. Cien immediately presented me to him, and conversed with him for some time. His Majesty's offering to do all in his power to assist my efforts for temperance, I was not a little surprised to find that the king was perfectly well informed on the subject, aware of its importance to all branches of industry, as also of its political and moral value; and more so to find that there was no disagreement in my views of the habitual use of wine. He stated expressly that the drunkenness of France was occasioned by wine; that in our district of his empire, there was much intemperance on gin, but he concluded wine the great evil. I took the liberty of a kiss him, in the English manner, and he returned the compliment. He said that he was weary of the evils of intemperance in France, and was anxious to see the same vanish. The touch of wine of France is too strong.

I promise you something that while in Virginia and Washington, some years since, I visited Messrs. Madison, Jackson, and Adams, and obtained their signature to an expression in favor of "intemperance" from ardent spirits. I turned this in His Majesty, and having the medal in my pocket, I showed it to him; he resisted to an other room, where he soon sat for me, and said: "Good; but when he returned to me, said that it was not my time, but well expressed, (you probably know that it was drawn up by our excellent fellow-laborer, Dr. Edwards.) After this our conversation continued, by my giving the history of our efforts, while confined to animal spirits, and the ruma, and necessity of our taking broader grounds, and trying to banish the use of intoxicating drinks." I submitted on paper to His Majesty, his perambulation, a declaration of our present views, and principles, and reasons for them. We were satisfied that the document was in need as a beverage by persons in health, are never to be sold, but harmful, and I that to abstain such use would greatly tend to promote the health, virtue, happiness, and prosperity of mankind."

"This he also read aloud, and immediately said, 'That is not I believe it, and would willingly sign it myself, if I thought it to be for the good of the present day.' This Mayday they signed in general, of the late-arrived, of the former nations, English, Irish, Scotch, and the French, who has taken the opportunity to do this, and not out of any night where there was. He did not do the best of doing manner the property backs each of our own country, to receive and profit by such a reformation with the difficulties to be met and overcome in France, and posed a high opinion on the character of our people.

I stated to the king, that I had been outside the barriers which surrounded Paris, and where the common people resorted to drink wine, because there it is free of duty. 'Ah,' said he, 'there you will see drunkenness.' And truly I had seen it there, in all its horrors and debasing effects, and chiefly on wine. I told him, that my gubbe had said that he thought that one-eighth of the population of Paris were drunkards; His Majesty thought it too great a proportion. I repeated also another remark made by my gubbe, 'that the king had done much for France who had shut the gaming-houses, but that he would do a still greater good, if he would stop the drinking of intoxicating drinks.'

Before closing, I must in justice to my own feelings, express to you, how much I have been indebted to Gen. Cass, our minister to this court. You know, that from the commencement of this, he has been greatly interested in this cause, and always ready to give his services in the most judicious and friendly way with the king; he seconded my views most liberally, and to his kind aid, under King, I am indebted for the favourable reception I received. In a day or two I leave for Italy. I hope to return to America some time next year, but shall be governed by circumstances.

In a letter written a few days afterwards, Mr. D. thus speaks of his interview with the Duke of Orleans.

Since my former letter, I have been introduced by our minister, Gen. Cass, to the Duke of Orleans, with whom I conversed in a private audience for an hour, on the subject of temperance. I was surprised to learn, that the Duke had long since wit-ed with the only society in France; which only recognizes the old pledge against ardent spirits. I informed him that we in America had changed our pledge, and entreated him to join the one we now set upon, the same I had shown the king; he remarked, as the king had done, that it was right and true, that he had no doubt that all intoxicating drinks are injurious to a beverage to men in health, and that the independence of France was on wine. The Duke went into a full relation of the great difficulties to be encountered in France. He stated that of the thirty-four millions of people, fourteen millions are engaged in some way directly or indirectly in making or vending intoxicating drinks. He also stated, that in those districts where most wine was made, there was also the greatest wretchedness, and the most frequent appeals to government for aid, and also, that so large a proportion of the soil was not cultivated for vines, that the raising of the stock and grain was almost dying to an abject extent, and that he looked to the destruction of the use of wine in other countries, as a source of hope for France; that, falling to a market for her wine, the fields of France might be cultivated to great advantage to produce more abundant food and clothing for the people. The Duke expressed great interest in the success of the cause every where; and so near he was in plunging and plunging with us, that, I was told, he only colour the water he drank, when in etiquette seems to make the use necessary.—Christ, Washington.

TRACTS BY PARVITY.—Mr. Ljung informs that poverty in Sweden means absolute destitution of food, fuel, and clothing, and that the numbers sunk in poverty are daily increasing. The cause of the alarming distress is a total loss of value of labour, so that the rural population in Sweden subsist on a coarse fare, and seek shelter in a house more comfortable than can be easily imagined in this country. Such being the case, we feel no hesitation in expressing our belief, that the spreading poverty of the Swedish people is for a more potent cause of their demoralization, than any of those defects in the political system, so much feared on by Mr. Ljung, or even than all of them put together. He, however, most unaccountably, overlooks the close connexion of destitution and immorality. The torments, while extending on the value of property, that the man who is deprived of his means of subsistence, is, for him, like a stone in a pile to a nation. He is a kind of a black spot, and it is a pity that he is not excluded from participation in the rights of citizenship. Thus, the moral statistics of Sweden, Mr. Ljung's able comments on them notwithstanding, contribute to a depression, that the first and most essential condition of a nation as a community, under all forms of government whatsoever, is the comfort and well-being of the lower orders.

Mr. Ljung concludes his report of Sweden thus:—"I have back three facts—first, The Swedish nation is more generally educated than the English, the Scotch, or perhaps any in Europe, except the British. Second, The Swedish nation is really a nation, except the Shroter Catholicism of the Lutheran church, is universal, that even the aid of the schoolmaster in these berries is superfluous in many districts, and the children are instructed by their parents. Third, The many political and other reforms are entirely based on the Christian religion, and the reforms on the book of the Bible, and the Bible is the only book that is read in the homes of the Swedish people. In no country in Europe is the church so constituted as powerful, and perfect. In Sweden there is a unity of church and state—the Church is a distinct and independent portion of the state, equal in its constitutional share in the legislature, to the whole body of the aristocracy, or of the representatives of the people; and possessing extensive authority and influence—besides its share in the Legislature—through its department of government for Church affairs. It has but one religion, its own, to deal with in the nation—there being no Catholics or Calvinists among the Swedes; and is undisturbed by persecution, or dissent of any note, from its doctrines or forms. Its members, as a body, are highly educated, of unblemished purity and zeal, with very efficient internal regulations in their establishment, for preventing negligence or laxity in the discharge of their duties, or the neglect of insignificant individuals to clerical functions. The exemplary church attendance of the people, the erection of new, and decoration of old churches by voluntary contributions, and the free-will offerings at Easter and Christmas to their pastors, prove beyond question the popularity and influence of the established clergy in Sweden, and the good feeling in general of their flocks towards them.—all, notwithstanding this powerful, effective, and complete church establishment, and notwithstanding this very wide diffusion of education and religious instruction by parental and clerical tuition, and by an extensive and efficient national establishment of public schools suitable to all classes, the Swedish nation stands among the lowest in the scale of morality.—no other three millions of moral beings in Europe appear to commit, within a given time, so large an amount of crime and moral transgressions."—Anti-Slavery.

SPOTS OF SHINGAPATAM.—The amount of the plunder at Shingapattam seemed to surpass all estimate. Major Prince says:

—None conception may, perhaps, be formed of the magnificent expectations which we were led to entertain, when I state that on the first day on which we were occupied in taking charge of the spoils, we counted not less than twelve hundred thousand valuable packages; which, at four rupees to the saluany, was equivalent to with forty-eight lakhs of rupees, or nearly half a million sterling. The packages being sealed up in bags of 1,000 each, it needed only to ascertain the contents of the first bag—before we were apprized by the amount of the weight, and to take the remainder by weight, in which there was never found the smallest deficiency. The prize spoils, seven in number, were therefore perhaps well warranted in congratulating each other on the fact each of 100,000 value, than in the morning of that day. In the meantime, a messenger of the palace had been sent to the sub-governor of the district of Europeans, ever before receiving of the court, the Tien-lah Khamsi, or large quantity, in the S. W. angle of the first court, was discovered, in the morning of the 15th, in the scene of ill-considered plunder. What led to this discovery, was a train of packages, strewn from the door of the depot, along the floor of the west verandah, to the entrance of the court, or quadrangle. The question arisen, was, whether this unfortunate spoliation had taken place prior to, or after, the period at which the palace had been put under safe-guard. But the loss to the treasury in general, could never be ascertained; while but little advantage accrued to the soldier. Nevertheless, some conception may be formed on the subject, when it is stated, that Dr. Mein, a surgeon in the army, purchased from a soldier of the 74th regt. for a mere trifle, two pairs of solid gold fangs, or fangs, set with diamonds; the last costly of which, was valued by a Hydrabad jeweller, at not less than 50,000 rupees; at the lowest exchange, equivalent with 52,000 sterling. The other pair he declared to be of such superlative value, that he would not pretend to express any opinion. It was, moreover, notorious, that a quantity of the most valuable pearls was to be bought in the bazars, from the soldiers, for a bottle of spirits."

Such are the principal items of the distribution:—the rest of the spoils, as Mr. Duffell himself made his appearance at the palace, and, with a few others, I supposed, a large number of the soldiers had been taken to him at the value of 1,000 sterling; but which, on being taken out of the setting, proved to be nothing more than a lump of coloured glass, not worth even a many pence. Fortunately, on referring to the register, it was found that I had entered it as pearls—(if real I must not omit). This was a mistake, but the parcel was handed over to the jeweller, for re-institution, he declared that the article was fully worth the sum; and that he had not a doubt but the money would be given for it in the bazar. The General consented to make the trial; and actually received, for the article, not less than 1,000 rupees beyond the valuation. We rejoiced at the circumstances; but I do not recollect that the General felt it expedient to rebuke the soldier. The article consisted of a bauble of false diamonds; which, certainly, did not appear better than many cheap talis, or bangles. They are, however, much used in the formation of native ornaments; and have, therefore, generally a ready sale."—Id.

"Much about the same time also, we had the misfortune of receiving from Major-General Popham, a most grievous complaint, that we had valued the allotment which fell to his share, at 1,000 sterling; whereas, they appeared to him nothing better than a lump of coloured glass. When the parcel was handed over to the jeweller, for re-institution, he declared that the article was fully worth the sum; and that he had not a doubt but the money would be given for it in the bazar. The General consented to make the trial; and actually received, for the article, not less than 1,000 rupees beyond the valuation. We rejoiced at the circumstances; but I do not recollect that the General felt it expedient to rebuke the soldier. The article consisted of a bauble of false diamonds; which, certainly, did not appear better than many cheap talis, or bangles. They are, however, much used in the formation of native ornaments; and have, therefore, generally a ready sale."—Id.

JAMAICA.—The Baptists of Falmouth, Jamaica, headed by the Rev. W. Knibb and other Baptist Missionaries, held a meeting on New Year's day, at which a series of resolutions were agreed to, pointing out the civil and political disabilities under which the negroes, though free, still labour, and seeking redress. The following is the second resolution:—"That the restriction of the elective franchise to about 1,500 persons in a population of more than 400,000 individuals, the subjects of Her Majesty, together with the almost total exclusion of our slaves from the exercise of this right, induce us to implore Her Majesty's Government to extend to us this privilege, on the payment of a certain rent for our habitation and grounds, or to frame for us those just and equitable laws by which we shall be protected from those who, in their legislative capacity, not only treated us with continuity and reproach, but have ever been desirous by penal and other statutes, to deprive us of that liberty which is our natural birthright." The other resolutions involve a spirit of loyalty to the Queen, and gratitude to the whole anti-slavery party.—Christ, Ada.

LORD WILLIAM C. BENTINCK.—Since Lord William Bentinck retired from the government of India, he has occupied little more than a private station. He has had no share in the administration of public affairs, and seldom raised his voice in the debates of Parliament. In Divisions, and on Committees, he gave the influence of a liberal and experienced member of the House of Commons, to the promotion of our national interests: but out of office, and without the faculty of mingling with readiness and force in parliamentary discussions, he was doing nothing which could not as effectually be done by any one of a thousand private gentlemen of sound principles, and but very inferior endowments. Had it not been for his zealous promotion of direct steam communication between England and India, there would have been little reason, therefore, to lament His Lordship's death as a public calamity: and hence the regrets it excites are of a more personal and tender character. We mourn the man, and not the officer of state. We sympathize with the grief of relative bereavement, and not with the anxieties of political vicissitude. On such an occasion, who can lose sight of the now advanced decadence of that generous heart, which, for so many years, drew enjoyment here from sympathy with affliction, the relief of want, and the promotion of whatever was kind and good? We feel assured, that a spirit of respectful yet affectionate condolence with Lady William Bentinck will permeate all ranks in India: and as many as understand the sanctity of affliction, and have faith in the God of all consolation, will not fail to intercede the throne of grace on her behalf.

Now that the grave has closed upon Lord Bentinck, we may expect prejudice to die away. Disclosures will continue to be made, which will relieve his memory of the odium of misfortune, of which he was neither the author, nor the willing executor. Passion will cease to indulge in distorted representations of his conduct. His wise and beneficent measures will, by degrees, stand out in due prominence; and in our history, his failings will be lost sight of. The period of his government will inevitably form an era, and a memorable one in the history of India. It will be remembered for its Acts, but still more for its spirit: and men will feel that whilst honour is always due to well-timed and well-executed measures of public policy, they are especially worthy of gratitude and praise, when, in addition to the specific good secured by them, they give birth and vigour to public principle—when they not only provide for a present necessity, but lead to progressive and abiding improvement in national character and condition. It may easily happen, that a measure founded on the principles of true philosophy, and dictated solely by benevolence and justice, should fail in execution at the time: but it will be fruitful in its ulterior, and higher results. Even in its failure, it will excite expectations in the people, and direct the aim of their rulers, until, on a more happy occasion, both shall issue in the successful attainment of their common object. It is hence the infinite superiority in seen of principle, over expediency and make-shift contrivance, in the conduct of national affairs—and hence it is that the excellence of Lord Bentinck's administration will be more and more manifest; for future years will develop its benefits.

As soon as Lord Bentinck landed in Bengal, he started and shook the whole community, by a sort of general summons to men of all classes, to think, and speak their thoughts, upon every thing that concerned either the people or the government. The effect was electrical. Some it frightened; but the great body of the people it made conscious of a new and happier existence. His Lordship's invitation had every appearance of honesty and earnestness at the first; and the first appearance was never belied even to the close of his rule. That truth might be heard from the public voice, he virtually gave freedom to the press: and to individuals he afforded the utmost facility of access to himself, not only by giving audience to every one who sought it, but by discarding all the form and ceremony that made an approach to Government House irksome or humiliating. Nor did he trust for information merely to those whose interest it was to bring it. He was as active in seeking for it, as free in receiving it. He was also prompt in the use of it. And his promptitude created the conviction, that the access he gave to himself was a substantial privilege.

From the opening of his commission to the close of his career, it seemed to be the uniform aim of His Lordship, to inspire the people of India with the sense, that their country was still their own, and their rulers were likewise their stewards, who recognized their obligations to administer affairs for the general good, and not merely for the corporate or individual interests of Englishmen; and his aim was attained. No other Governor General was ever addressed, on retiring from power, in such terms as were used by the Natives of this country to Lord Bentinck: "Under your Lordship's paternal administration," said they, "a new era has dawned upon us, tending to establish a community of feeling and identity of interest between races separated by almost every conceivable circumstance of alienation, and united only under the same political Government and in allegiance to the same Crown. Your Lordship has first taught us to forget the distinction between conquerors and conquered, and to become in heart and mind, in hopes and aspirations, one with Englishmen. We ardently desire to cherish these feelings. We trust they will descend to our children, and to our children's children."

Undying honour will attend the memory of the ruler, whose state-craft produced a result like this. It alone would have been enough to establish his character as a statesman of the highest rank, had there been no particular acts of wisdom and beneficence in his government to vindicate his claims to such a title. It is not the faculty of ordinary men to conciliate all minds, to win all hearts, and to harmonize all interests. As respected the people over whom he ruled, Lord Bentinck did this effectually—and that not in a course of facile compliance with the popular inclination, but in one occasionally of the firmest opposition to it, and frequently of perfect independence of any popular suggestion.

But in His Lordship's administration, there was no lack of great measures. The abolition of Sutees was enough to immortalize any single administration: and those who have attempted to detract the honour of it from His Lordship's reputation, have only exposed their own malignity. Even they, however, are unable to question the admirable policy, by which His Lordship was enabled to carry his most unpopular measure without shaking the public tranquility, or alienating from himself and his government the affections of the people. He could dispense with force and authority. He appealed to the deep feelings of nature, and, even in the hearts of his opponents, created a war of sentiment which made them weak in their opposition to him. He allowed the untrained expression of their discontent, until it ex-haunted itself. And he sent them on an Appeal to higher and distant authority, which turned off the force of their irritation from the local government, and let it pass away to far off regions, where it ended innocuously to all parties.

It is a very vulgar idea to estimate the importance of such a measure as the abolition of Suttees by the number of victims spared and the anguish and misery from which they are rescued. As well might we consider the whole evil of English prize fighting to be in the punishment of the ring. All such things are springs of national demoralization; and if they be not stopped up, no means what ever will be successful in regenerating a people. From the abolition of Suttees will be traced, in after times, the growth of relative endearment, of generous sensibility, of abhorrence of cruelty, and of repugnance to such superstition as outrages natural affection, with all the blessings which flow from such sentiments; and as thus the nations of India rise in humanity and worth, the name of Lord William Bentinck will be enshrined in their hearts with devout and fervent gratitude.

It was in pursuing the same line of generous benefaction, that His Lordship abolished the barbarities and ignominies of corporal punishment, both in the Army and the Magistrates' Courts. Those who think of nothing in the punishment of crime, but the prevention of its overt acts; and who would be satisfied, if, by a strong hand, the people could be kept under a forced restraint from outward violence and dishonesty, whatever might be their moral condition and principles, instead of applauding this measure of His Lordship, continue to honour it with their abuse. But it is otherwise esteemed by such as look for public morality from private intelligence and virtue.

By such measures as these, Lord Bentinck set himself to clear away the obstructions to the national improvement of the country; and by others he sought directly to advance it. He did much to throw life into the Government scheme of public education, and, at the close, crowned his efforts of this kind by instituting the Medical College; which, like other creations of his, was produced with the natural tendency to improvement upon its original character. He would gladly have added Christian to secular instruction, in order to make good the reformation of India; but being bound to act in his official character, he was content, both from his own conception of just policy, and from regard to good faith, to maintain the most scrupulous observance of strict neutrality on the subject of religion in his own educational measures; whilst he rejoiced in the freedom of Missionaries and private persons to act otherwise, commended their proceedings, and urged them to an unlimited extension of their efforts.

As another and very powerful means of raising the character and condition of the people, His Lordship opened to them the avenues of public employment and honour—a measure so noble, so wise, so boundless in the train of its healing and benignant influences, that it is impossible to form an adequate conception of its excellence. His endeavour to introduce the principles of self-government, by reviving the Jury or Panchayat system throughout the country, failed, from the want of suitable means to bring it into effect. It remains, however, on record, for the benefit of the next Governor-General on whom His Lordship's mantle may fall, and the generation that may be blessed by his rule.

There are two other measures of Lord Bentinck which show how his thoughts for the good of India tended: we mean the Commission for the Suppression of Thuggee, and the appointment of the Prison Discipline Committee. Much good has been done by both; and had His Lordship been here, to follow up their proceedings with the same purpose and energy in which they originated, we are convinced that the former would have extended by this time into a general system for the suppression of dacoity, and the establishment of peace and safety, through the whole country; and the latter would not have ended in a mere Report—vox ex preteritis silii.

But we must refrain from further enumeration of Lord Bentinck's claims to the gratitude of India and her friends. He has passed beyond the reach of their praise; and the remembrance that he has, gives renewed and vastly heightened interest to the touching words he addressed with so much feeling—with almost stifled utterance—to the Missionaries of Bengal: "I must at the same time recollect, that it is part of that charity which you so earnestly teach and practice, to think no evil, and to regard with indulgence conduct that seems to emanate from good intentions. But even your praise must not mislead me from a deep consciousness and confession of my own unworthiness, or make me forget that only in humble dependence upon the Giver of all mercies, I can hope by earnest prayer to obtain forgiveness for the acceptable use I have made of the talents committed to my care." These words fall solemnly and sweetly on the heart, as they that he has not only resigned his charge of earthly power, but life itself, into the hands of Him who gave it. We cannot better close this notice, than by adding the eloquent and feeling testimony borne by the Bishop of Calcutta to the character of Lord Bentinck, as he presided on Monday last, at the meeting on Steam Communication.

"The Right Reverend Chairman addressed the meeting as follows. Gentlemen,—It is not without some reluctance that I have taken the Chair on this occasion, because I think, that matters not directly of a religious character, the chair of public meetings is better filled by gentlemen more immediately concerned with the subject in hand. Still, so far as may be in accordance with my sacred duty, I am always happy to support the every other design, which has for its object the good of India, and of the world at large. But what overcame my reluctance to act as chairman, at this time, was an intimation from Mr. Grosvenor, that it was designed to offer some tribute to the memory of our late Governor-General, Lord William Cavendish Bentinck, the names of whose death, at Paris, have just reached us. Who I remembered his exertions in the cause in which we are assembled, and in every other design for the happiness of India, I did not think it possible for me to decline the invitation with which I was honoured. It was Lord William Bentinck, who in 1848, first instilled into my mind that zeal for the cause of Steam Communication, which has ever since animated me. It was Lord William Bentinck who induced me to send the little letter in the June of that year, which many gentlemen before me remember, and which contributed, perhaps, in some measure, to advance the subscriptions then begun. I had continual opportunities afterwards of knowing, that the same distinguished person used every exertion in his power in furtherance of the great cause. A tribute to his memory, is, therefore, most justly due.

"Moreover, when I remember the warm kindness which he displayed towards myself—when I remember the integrity of his character, his love for India, and his appreciation of the advantages of native education, I am still further disposed to honour his name. When I add to this his private charities,—his attentions to all around him, (he has more than once at Clarendon 2,000 rupees into the plate for the District Charitable Society)—when I remember, that I never missed him at Church when his health would allow him to attend—when I call to mind his avowed allegiance to the Christian religion,—the interest which he took in the wise and discreet progress of Christian missions,—his Christian purity, his family piety, his love to his wife, his kindness and benignity to all around him—the example, in short, that he set to India—all these induce me, as a man,—as a resident in this country, as a Christian, and as one holding the office I do in the Church, to offer my feeble but heartfelt testimony of love to the memory of Lord William Bentinck."

CHINA.—Accounts have been received from China to the 28th of June. The state of affairs was as unsatisfactory as they have been since the Imperial Commissioner commenced his campaign against the Opium; and the obstacles to a reconciliation of interests appear rather to increase than diminish. Capt. Elliot had retired to Macao, at which place the Chinese authorities had pleaded him; and he appears to have issued a proclamation in his own defence, addressed to the Chinese, in which the violence and perfidy which had marked the recent proceedings, were unsparingly exposed. An attack from the Chinese appears also to have been threatened, as the Cambridge had been chartered to act as a guard ship. Two edicts had been put forth by the Chinese; the one forbidding any traffic with the vessels at Macao, under the usual Chinese penalty of death; the other, ordering the foreign ships either to return to Canton, or to quit the country in five days. The destruction of the Opium had commenced in real earnest. The Commissioner superintended the process with his own eyes. Three hundred chests were brought out duly, and their contents cast into the pit, and trodden under foot by the coolies; and strange to say, some of the tracts which had been issued by the Missionaries, calling upon the Chinese to abstain from the use of this poison, were destroyed with the Opium. A merchant who proceeded to the spot, and witnessed the process, has testified to the European community that the Opium was bona-fide destroyed, without any deception. He is evidently an American, and has taken the opportunity of moralizing on the superior virtue and disinterestedness of the Chinese, which places them, in his opinion, in an advantageous contrast with the English smuggling community. We heartily join him in thinking that the Chinese have read a great moral lesson to the English; but brother Jonathan should be chary of moral contrasts, while he keeps two millions and a half of slaves in his own free country,—the freest under the sun. As to the disinterestedness of the Chinese, who have so virtuously destroyed the Opium they had obtained by an act of national violence, instead of selling it for two millions sterling, it is altogether so novel and unexpected a virtue; so extremely foreign to the national character and habits, that we scarcely know what to think of it. A large defalcation in the revenue, and a serious diminution of the circulating medium, is described by the Chinese themselves as having led to this act of most unaccountable exasperation or disinterestedness. If the Chinese can be relied on, the Imperial Palace of Peking was not free from the pollution of this drug, and the highest personage in the empire is believed to have had his interests hitherto enlisted in favour of it. But even acquitting the Emperor of any interested connivance at the trade, all the Mandarins under him, through all ranks, and in all provinces, with here and there an honourable exception, have participated in the clandestine trade. The edicts, couched in language so moral and so solemn, have been known to be mere waste paper. The very officers who promulgated them, were at the moment engaged in violating them. Even so late as the last year, the present viceroy of Canton kept no fewer than five smuggling boats in his own employ on the river. The Admiral on the station acted in the same manner outside; and for a considerable time the revenue cutters almost exclusively received the drug from the smuggling vessels. When the foreigners were confined at Canton, and the Opium was on the point of being delivered up, the Mandarin junka anchored in front of Macao and smuggled Opium, without interruption. Lin, the Commissioner, whose vigorous arm has dug the grave, in which are entombed two millions sterling of British property; is stated by the Chinese who know him, to belong to a family notorious for their Opium smuggling propensities. We must take the disinterested virtue of the Chinese, therefore, with some small grains of allowance.

But what is to be done? The Chinese will have the drug; and the foreigners will sell it at the point of the bayonet, while it will yield them a profit. Whatever doubts existed as to the strength of this habit, and the possibility of eradicating it by the power of the State, they have been laid at rest for ever by the last intelligence. One might have supposed, that the tyrannical act of Lin, in the seizure of the Opium, and his firmness in destroying it, had put an end, at least for the present, to the trade. No such thing. While he was engaged in superintending the destruction of Opium, at that very same time was the traffic again rearing its head; and the drug was freely taken off at from seven hundred to a thousand dollars a chest. If so daring a violation of the Imperial edict was perpetrated while he was in the neighbourhood, armed with dictatorial powers, with what cogency may we not expect the trade to revive when he shall have quitted Canton, and resigned the government into the hands of those who, before his arrival, were its most barefaced encouragers? While, therefore, on the one hand, it appears a physical, as well as a moral impossibility, to put a period to the trade and consumption of Opium, the new law will not allow the legitimate trade to the re-established at Canton, unless the merchants will sign a bond making themselves responsible, with life and property, for the introduction of the drug; that is, unless they will sign their own death warrant. How this anomalous state of things is to be remedied, there is, perhaps, no man wise or hardy enough to form us. The national pride of the Chinese has just received an unlimited accession of strength; and it is secretly to be supposed, that amidst the intoxication of recent success, they will listen to the voice of reason and justice. Let the merchants retire, and close the trade for a year, say some. This will force the Chinese, by the distress it will entail on them, to open their ports on reasonable terms. That the Empire would suffer to an incalculable degree by the cessation of the foreign trade, admits of no doubt; but England would also suffer in the abstraction of tea, and the loss of revenue, to an extent, which would force any Ministry to put an end to this state of things, even at some sacrifice of national dignity. And while we were absent, the Americans would be present, and supplied with British capital to carry on the trade as briskly as ever; unless, indeed, we were to send a declaration of war to Peking, and declare Canton in a state of blockade; but just at the present moment it would be found rather awkward to engage in a new war which would extend the scene of our warfare from the Caspian to the Yellow Sea. All that can be said by the wisest among us, is, that circumstances have reached a crisis, at which it is impossible to perceive a distant opening of relief.

MR. MACAULAY.—Among the articles of intelligence imported by the last Mail, next to the defeat of the Turkish army, Mr. Macaulay's return for Edinburgh, is, perhaps, the most surprising, more especially when viewed in connection with Mr. Tait's return to Calcutta. After the brand of eternal infamy had been affixed on him, by the writers and speakers of this Presidency; after he had been excommunicated with bell, book and candle, and had been declared by one of the most prominent speakers in Calcutta, to be forever unfit to assist in the debates of Parliament; nay, after it had been solemnly declared in terms of the deepest indignation, that he never should sit in Parliament again, to find him on his first address to one of the first constituencies in the United Kingdom, elected, without opposition, to succeed the Speaker in the House of Commons, as representative of the capital of Scotland, is prodigious; is very mortifying. But what renders the circumstance infinitely more mortifying, is, that the election appears to have been made, after he had passed successfully through the ordeal of a seven-enteching on the Code, of which his opponents had declared that, like another great man, he would go down to posterity with it in his hand, only with accumulated infamy, instead of honour.

While the individual on whom the Calcutta community has fixed the paternity and the misnomer of the Act, called the Black Act, has thus been lifted into Parliament, the gentleman who was deputed to effect its repeal, after a strenuous attempt to fulfil his mission with his wonted zeal and ability, has been obliged to return unsuccessful to Calcutta. On his departure for Canada, the business was assigned to a gentleman in London, from whom we were led to expect every thing. But although the present Session is advanced almost to its close, there has been no motion made on the subject, nor does the name of the Act appear, so far as we can learn, to have been once pronounced in the House. We may, therefore, reasonably conclude, that the case is hopeless. Far be it from us to speak in any terms of exultation, either of the triumph of Mr. Macaulay, or of the extinction of all hope that the Black Act will be repealed; but we think that high circumstances may teach us a lesson of moderation. On such subjects we have had the misfortune to differ from our contemporaries; and it may be expected, that in matters in which we are in the minority of a single unit, we should speak with becoming modesty. Still we hope it will not be considered treason against the interests of India, if we continue to think that the existence of the Act on our statute book is matter for little regret. We never were able, dimly, through an obscurity of intellect, to perceive any of those evils which were propounded from the repeal of a law, which endowed the European community with exclusive privileges, to the crime of which they were, however, so blind, as not to have used the offender than twice in twenty years. Our view of the matter has been strengthened by the fact, that since the passing of the Act, furiously called the Black Act, no instance has been adduced of its injurious effect on the interests of the European community. We do not say, therefore, that there is any cause for regret in the loss of all hope that the Act will be repealed. On the general question of grievances, it has always appeared in our humble apprehension, that while in this country we have few rights, we have still fewer wrongs; and that real, substantial wrongs—wrong which can be made palpable to the understanding, and which no sophistry can extenuate, will always be redressed in England, sooner or later. When these grievances happen to affect the Native, as well as the European community, they stand a still better chance of commanding the most respectful attention; and there are few, if any, instances in which addresses from this country, for the removal of unequivocal evils, have failed of success. Thus when the Supreme Court had for years, in its grasp for power, stretched forth its hand to all persons and all things; when that which was intended as a blessing, had become a curse, and the whole European community of Calcutta making common cause with the Natives, went up to Parliament with the public grievances, Parliament at once listened to their complaints, and ordered the Chief Justice to be recalled and prosecuted, and narrowed the jurisdiction of the Court, so as to adapt it to the convenience of society. When, on more recent occasions, the community of Calcutta, European and Native, made a combined effort for the privilege of European colonization, for the equalization of the Sugar Duties, for the suppression of the Cooly Trade; all these beneficial measures were, in the end, secured. But it must be remembered that these real grievances were treated of in that calm, firm and determined manner, which is the surest forerunner of success; and not in that wild and impassioned strain, which has too often been employed of late, and on no occasion more conspicuously than in reference to the Act in question, and its author; but which is the unerring prognostic of failure. In reference more particularly to Mr. Macaulay's admission into Parliament, it is unfortunate that those who direct the judgement of the Calcutta community, should have committed themselves to a prophecy, which belied as it is by the event, makes an awkward recoil. It is the denunciations which were so unwisely fulminated against Mr. Macaulay, that have given his return to Parliament, which in other circumstances, would have passed over with little notice, the air of a triumph over the voice of Calcutta.

STEAM.—We have seen a letter of the 15th June, from one much occupied in Steam projects, and deeply interested in the success of the great Comprehensive Scheme, which does not give a very encouraging account of proceedings in London; at least he says, that the prospect of obtaining the support of the East India Company to the Comprehensive Scheme has not advanced since the last report of May. "It is," however, under consideration, and we expect to get an answer on Wednesday, 19th June. There has been a person appointed to consider the matter, and report at the Liberator by that date. Unfortunately, Lord W. Bentinck is not able to attend to his parliamentary business from his lameness, and should have got the grant, ere this, I think. Money is not easily procured just now for such schemes; and it is, perhaps, better that it was deferred now till we get news from your Bengal Steam Committee, after the receipt of the result of the public meeting of 18th January. I hope that you will have determined on building a vessel at once yourselves, and have begun her on the plan already sent out. The Indian Steam Navigation Inhibitor has been exposed by the publication of a correspondence between Messrs. Howell, Ogilvie and Co. which, showing such barefaced designs of humbugging sailors here, that I am afraid it will be very difficult to get support to any thing Indian after this, and Capt. Ross's famous scheme."

This state of things is certainly far from satisfactory; and we fear that even with Mr. Curtis's best zeal there will be nothing done positively towards the great and only truly beneficial scheme, for a long time to come.

It is very much to be regretted, that the movement made in Calcutta some months ago, towards positive action in the construction of the first large Vessel for the comprehensive route by subscription here in Calcutta, was not followed up. She would have now been in a good state of forwardness; and the knowledge of this would have been a better spur to the activity of our London friends, than all the reports of Town Hall meetings we could send them.

We hope to see those who were the promoters of this plan on the alert again; and surely the Steam subscribers would be much better pleased to see their money at once applied to the object in view, by the construction of a really good and valuable tank vessel, than in having it lying idle in the Dock, or placed at the disposal of a Committee in England, who move so slowly, and in the face of so many obstacles.

After the above was in type, we received the Report of the New Bengal Steam Fund, and of the meeting held in Calcutta to receive it. On this occasion, Mr. H. M. Parker delivered one of the most forcible and eloquent speeches which has ever been heard in Calcutta, culminated, as usual, with his characteristic elegant humour. In it he assembled every thing which it was necessary to say upon the subject of Steam, with the exception of the startling fact subsequently adduced by Capt. Taylor, that to put the road between Naggora and Calcutta into such a state as to meet the public wishes, would require a sum, which would go far to procure us a Steamer of the largest dimensions. We beg the reader to bear this fact in mind, as he reads over Mr. Parker's speech, which we have transferred entire to our columns.

With all deference for the opinions of those who, in this country, and in England, have urged forward this great and important undertaking, we may be permitted to remark, that in our humble judgment, it would have been better for the Steam Company to have confined itself, for the present, at least, to the supplying that in which we are really deficient, a relay of vessels of the largest power to ply between Calcutta and Suva. By undertaking the communication also between Falmouth and Alexandria, they appear to us unnecessarily to "fetter their enterprise with a larger responsibility than is by any means necessary. For passengers on the European side of the route, there are already in existence Her Majesty's Steamers, which the Admiralty will be obliged, from the complexion of affairs, to increase, rather than to diminish. There are also the French Steamers, three times a month, and the Austrian panzers. With all these facilities already in existence, it appears to us that the Steam Company would act prudently in confining their attention to the provision of Steamers on the Pacific side, to break the extension of their operations to the European waters, to some future emergency, when there appeared a probability that the existing means of access would be interrupted. We are inclined to think that the number of passengers, more especially from India, who would prefer the quick Steamers, or who would like to choose their own route to England, would so materially diminish the passengers likely to avail themselves of the Company's Steamers, as greatly to offset the profits. As it regards the remittance of the Mails, the present arrangement concluded with the French Government, seems to us that letters will no longer be entrusted to vessels which adopt the Gibraltar route. Speed being the grand object in the transmission of Mails, every one will naturally be anxious to save eight or ten days, by sending his letters through France. If the projects of the Committee were, therefore, discomfited of the necessity of providing vessels to Alexandria, it would be comparatively easy, by one bold and grand effort, on both sides the water at once to provide a route of 2,000 tons burden, by which the Comprehensive Scheme might be carried into immediate effect.

Mr. Parker mentioned, in the course of his speech, that the transmission of the Mails from Bombay to Calcutta, occupied from sixteen to twenty-two days. Supposing, however, vessels of adequate power, equal to those which plough the Atlantic, to be laid on the route, letters would be conveyed by them from Calcutta to Suva, in less time than is now required simply for the transmission of them across the continent of India. If the time required, with stoppages, from Calcutta to Suva, were even to amount to twenty days, the scheme would still stand thus:

Between Calcutta and Suva, ... ..	20 days.
Between Suva and Alexandria, ... ..	4
Between Alexandria and Calais, ... ..	17
Between Calais and London, ... ..	1

In all, forty-two days, or six weeks for letters from Calcutta to London. This is no visionary prospect; for one that is within our reach, and within reach in a twelvemonth, if the Directors had but the heart to lend it a helping hand.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.
—The Church of Scotland has been brought into a very critical position, by the proceedings of the General Assembly in May last. It does not come within our province, to enter on a discussion of the propriety of what has been done. But as there are many in India who are deeply interested in the matter, we shall devote several columns next week, to the report given by the Scottish Pilot, of the principal speeches made in the Assembly on the Auchtermadar case. In the meantime we would call attention to other transactions of the Assembly of a more gratifying nature. On the 23d of May, the Report of the India Mission was read and approved, and Dr. Duff delivered a farewell address to the Assembly; after which the Moderator, on the motion of Mr. Donip, called on Mr. Clark, of Inverness, to commend Dr. Duff to Almighty God, in the view of his speedy return to India; and Colonel Donnis proposed that a sum of money should be raised anonymously, to be placed at the Doctor's disposal, as a testimony of admiration for his zeal and talents. On the same day the Report of the Committee on Colonial Churches was received: and Mr. Morgan, of Belfast, made a statement to the Assembly, on behalf of the Home Mission of the Synod of Ulster. Next day, Dr. Chalmers read the Report of the Church Extension Committee. He commenced by stating that the last year had fallen considerably short of each of the preceding ones, both in regard to the number of new Churches and the revenue. The Churches for which subscriptions have been commenced within the year, were 14, and the total amount of revenue, local and general, was £25,418. The Report went on to state the various ways in which the funds had been allocated. It appeared that during the five years of the existence of the Committee, 211 new Churches have been erected, or are in course of erection, and £233,868 have been subscribed.

The Report of a deputation appointed to proceed to the High lands, for the purpose of inquiring into certain irregularities, was also read. The deputation had examined the clergy of the Presbytery of Skye. It appeared that there was a great and general neglect of "soul-saving labours;" and it was reckoned that no fewer than 1,000 individuals were untaught in the whole Presbytery. It was in evidence that at least one of the Ministers of Skye held heretical doctrines with regard to the Sacrament. A Committee was appointed to examine the whole subject. On the 25th of May, Dr. Dickson, in the absence of Dr. Baird, read the Report of the Committee on Education. At the same meeting, Mr. Canfield laid on the table the Report of the Committee on the Conversion of the Jews. Without reading the Report, he adverted to one or two facts to show what had been done since last year. He mentioned that, when the port of Aden was taken possession of by the British Government, the thought had occurred to an eminent gentleman in Edinburgh, whose name he was not at liberty to mention, that it would be an excellent place to occupy as a Missionary Station, and he had placed at the disposal of the friends of the Church £200 a year in support of such a Mission. By this liberality the Committee had been enabled to meet this call in Providence, and would take immediate steps for the planting of a Mission at the port of Aden.

Of Dr. Duff's speech before the Assembly we have only the following brief notice. It exhibits the worthy Doctor's usual singularity of tone, when speaking either of himself or of others. The Scottish Pilot describes the whole speech as "eloquent and highly figurative."

"He commenced by observing, that there was a time when, even in that house, it was necessary for any one to appeal to the Bible, to prove the duty of the Christian Church for engaging in missions. They had all heard the story of the venerable Erskine, who, when once one was advocating missions, exclaimed, 'Give me that Bible!' blessed be God, those days were gone by; and his prayer was, that they might be hurried in oblivion, never to be inserted on the tablets of history. But, though they had made a noble beginning, they ought to remember it was but a beginning. A calculation had been made by a most acute and intelligent missionary, that if the propagation of the gospel went on at the rate it had done for the last thirty years, it would take twenty thousand years before the world could even be nominally Christianized. He then referred to the state of education in India, and mentioned that while infidel and anti-Christian books, were permitted in the public libraries in India, Christian books were forbidden. The friends of religion in London had resolved to remedy this; and they reflected an extensive assortment of religious books, and sent them over to India, with a simple request that they might be put along with the other books. Out of twenty public institutions, only two had involuntarily received the gift, all the rest had rejected it with scorn. After expatiating on the difficulties to be encountered from the prejudices of the Hindoos, and expressing his confidence that they would be overcome, and that speedily, he came to consider the duty which rested upon Christians at home. There was a great delusion he felt respecting the impression made on the public mind by platform meetings. The announcement of the presence of an eloquent man would draw together, perhaps, a thousand people; but, if the exhibition of a Polar bear was announced, as many could be induced to attend; and, though those who were present were warmed and elevated with the topics brought before them, yet the thousands who did not attend were altogether careless, and even ignorant, of the subject; so that the meeting might be compared to a volcano that tossed out flames of fire, but they were tossed and rolled on waves of ice and snow, where they were speedily extinguished, and went into innamy, and did nothing. The great object ought to be to interest the masses in this subject,—to turn it into the school, the pulpit, and the Church rooms. They had heard that day of the death-knell of the Church being rung. He felt it was rung, indeed, if they neglected this subject. If they took it up, they would go on in spite of all the principalities and powers of the earth. (Loud, loud.) They talked much of the spirit of their fathers, but how did they ever strive to imitate their example? He had heard much, lately, of admiring the tombs of the martyrs; and when he looked to the men who did it, he was painfully reminded of another class of men who garbished the sepulchres of the prophets; and yet they were told by our Saviour, fill ye up the measure of your fathers, for all the blood that has been shed, from righteous Abel to this day, shall come upon this generation. They talked of the mighty deeds of their fathers, while they were seated at their luxurious banquets; but if they would really imitate their example, it must be by making sacrifices. He then came to his own personal feelings at reviewing his labours. He felt he could not entertain their sympathies, if he was like some who came before the Assembly petitioning for employment in this country. What was to be thought of a man who, after expressing his willingness to labour in the Christian vineyard, after he surveyed it in all its extent, and discovered some spots well cultivated, others only partially reclaimed, while the greater part remained a barren waste:—What would be thought if he were to neglect the wilderness, and position the cultivators of the fertile spots to be allowed to remain among them? He judged no man; but, for himself, he could not answer it to his own conscience,—it would be the basest treachery to his Saviour,—if he refused to go. Dr. Duff concluded with a glowing protestation, in anticipation of the time when the gospel would become universal over the world.

WEEKLY EDITORIAL OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 20.

Intelligence has been received from China to the 26th of June. The intelligence is as unfavourably as ever. There does not appear to have been any collision between the English vessels and the Chinese junk, but as the former had been ordered to depart from Macao in five days, or to come up to Canton, a collision was reasonably to be expected.—The Hundred Countries states, that the Court of Directors have resolved to take effectual steps for putting a stop to the correspondence of military men with the newspapers; and that paper seems to approve of the resolution. The Englishman has offered a long commentary on the article, which closes with this startling conclusion. "For all the real evils which have resulted from a free press, however, as connected with military men, the Company have to thank the late Lord William Bentinck, who did most to identify the army with its employers!"—The Englishman states that the anxiety which was felt regarding the hostile disposition of the Ameer of Scinde has been entirely removed, by their having ratified the treaty, as it was revised by Lord Auckland.—The Society of Arts has offered a considerable Premium in any individual who shall raise the greatest quantity of flax in the East Indies in the season of 1840.—The Caleutta Gazette of last evening, contains a public order, (which will be found under the Military Orders,) for the establishment of a Secondary School, in connection with the Medical College of Caleutta.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 18.

It is again rumoured in the papers, that Mr. Macnaghten will assume the Government of the North Western Provinces, on the return of Lord Auckland to Caleutta. Who is to supply his place at Calcutta?—We are happy to learn that Government is likely to adopt nearly all the improvements in the Post Office Department, suggested by Capt. Taylor, before he quitted his official appointment. Dr. Ranken's report is said to be the only thing waiting to secure their being carried into effect.—The Court of Directors are affirmed to have expressed themselves favourable to the establishment of local Mints; which appears singular after the enormous expense at which the splendid Mint in Caleutta has been erected.—The illustrious Bheem Sehn Thappa, for twenty years Prime Minister of Nepal, under whose administration that country rose to greatness, after having been confined in prison and tortured, died of a wound inflicted in an attempt to murder himself. To the eternal disgrace of that Court his body has been denied funeral rites, and thrown out to be devoured by jackals and vultures.—Letters from Simla state, that the prospect of a war with the Nepaules was very proximate; that the death of Hanger Sing had suggested to the Nepal Court the possibility of an outbreak, with the view of recovering the provinces formerly wrested from them.—The arrangement which has been made with the French Government, for the transmission of our Sierran Passants, through France, are given in full in the papers of this day. We have published an account of it among our selections. It is a most favourable plan as it respects India, and will always give us later news than we could have received by way of Gibraltar, but we fear it will injure Mr. Waghorn's interests.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 17.

Intelligence has been received that Capt. Melcol, the Acting Resident at Ava, has been obliged to leave the Capital, and return to Rangoon, because the rise of the Irrawaddy had flooded the sand bank on which he was lodged. The King refused to give him any other lodging; and never took the slightest notice of his departure. We learn also that fortifications are ordered to be erected, without delay, at Rangoon, and on the opposite side of the river. It must be clear that while we have no minister at this Court, we must remain in total ignorance of the movements it may make against us, and that our frontier provinces must always be exposed to the incursions of this barbarous power.—Intelligence has been received from the AGRA or THE INDIA. After great difficulties, from a deficiency of food, it reached the far famed Khelat-i-Gilshan, where no opposition was made. The army is vastly overproportioned to the service it has to perform; and the provisions are equally disproportioned to the army; hence the privations of this campaign.—The papers state that 40,000 Rupees have been purloined from the Government Agency, and pledged under forged indentments with the Bank of Bengal.—The 12th N. I. left Barrackpore, on its way to Benares, at the beginning of this week; and the 15th is to follow it on Monday, to Dinapore.—The Agra Bank has just declared a dividend of nine per cent.; one per cent. more than the Metropolitan Banks. It was also determined to embrace the opportunity offered by a large cash balance, for the safe issue of a small paper circulation, to assist the Natives to it.

MONDAY, AUGUST 19.

The accounts which have been received from Aden, gives hopes of its increasing commercial prosperity. Two of the most influential and extensive growers of coffee had come down to visit Capt. Haines, and expressed the utmost anxiety to be enabled to dispose of their produce there.—A Monsieur de Ledere, who was apprehended at Sikarpore by order of Mr. Marnaghten, as a spy, has been sent to Bombay, and there it has been discovered that the suspicion was a mistake.—Private letters received by the Overland Mail affirm, that it is a common topic of conversation, that the Madras Presidency will be abolished, and its territory annexed to Bombay and Calcutta; (not this side the expiration of the Charter certainly).—A correspondent from Chittor notices, that a most outrageous assault had been committed in that Zillah, on a Missionary of the London Society, by a number of Brahmins.—The salute on Thursday last, which was by many supposed to be a tribute to the memory of Lord William Bentinck, turns out to have been merely the exercising of the gun boats destined for the Barmese war, whenever there is one.—At the auction sale of the freight of the Malakanga, there was a very heavy demand, and much of it sold at five Rupees a foot.—The abatement of Company's Paper from the Government Agency, which was at first stated at 40,000 Rupees, turns out not to have exceeded 18,000.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 21.

The Steamer, with troops from Jussapore, reached Gowhaty, on Sunday, the 4th of this month. Such a sight has never been seen on the Behrampooter; the Natives were overwhelmed with astonishment; and both banks of the river were crowded with eager spectators.—The Zephia has sailed from Bombay without any Mail, which, though despatched on the day declared by the Post Office authorities to be the last day, reached Bombay two days after the Steamer had taken her departure.—The sailing vessel which was sent to Aden with Mail, made the voyage at the amazingly short period of fifty-five days. When we hear of the arrival of the Water Witch at that station, (and she promised to perform the journey in forty days,) we shall have an opportunity of comparing the facilities for the trip to the Red Sea in the monsoon, which are enjoyed respectively by Bombay and Calcutta.—The papers contain the detailed organization of the force which is to proceed to Joudhpore, under the command of Major General Lampton. It is to consist of six Regiments of Infantry, with, however, so small a sprinkling of cavalry, as to lead to the supposition that no great opposition is expected.—The name of Mr. Bain, the Fellow Surgeon, is mentioned in this day's papers.—The Bombay Government has determined to anticipate an arrangement which had been made regarding the despatch of the next steamer. She is to be despatched four days earlier than was at first appointed.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 21.

The Falmouth Mail, according to the expectations of our Editors, may be hacked for at Bombay this day, though it will be more than a fortnight before it can be expected in Calcutta.—The Enterprise Steamer is preparing for another trip to Rangoon; and it is rumoured, that she carries the ultimatum of this Government, on the conduct and position of the Burmese ruler; and that on her return, we shall either have a confirmed peace, or war to the hilt.—The abstraction of Notes from the Government Agency was, it is affirmed, detected three months ago; but this precious period appears to have been wasted in ascertaining whether the parties to whom the Notes belonged had authorized their sale; meanwhile the Notes were pledged at the Bank of Bengal under forged endorsements, and the recovery of the money has become peculiarly difficult.—It is affirmed in the Ceylon papers, that the 18th Royal Irish, one company of the Royal Artillery, and six companies of the Ceylon Rifle Corps have been placed at the disposal of the Governor General, and have been warned to hold themselves in readiness to embark for Mouleim.—The Delhi Gazette states, that letters had been received from Cabul, by way of Peshawar, stating that the Army of the Sikhs had actually taken possession of Cabul, and that Dost Mahomed had fled.—The Bark, Christopher Pearson, which was laden with rice, and on the eve of taking her departure for the Mauritius, has been condemned as unseaworthy.—The Esperanza, at Bombay, in the bottom of which the Bombay rats had eaten a variety of holes, has been repaired, the holes stopped up, and the vessel again sent to sea.—Our good friend, the Chondrika, has come forward to recommend for the office of Translator to Government, Cully

Shanker Nunder, who has given him great assistance in translating for his paper.

PRIZE FOR THE BEST ESSAY IN HINDUSTANI, ON THE EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.

The gentleman who offered a prize through the medium of the Bishop of Calcutta, for the last Essay in Hindustani, on the Evidences of Christianity, with a Refutation of Hindooism; is desirous of enlarging the time for the presentation of such a work. We are, therefore, requested to give notice, that any Essay, considered best deserving of the Prize of 1000 Rs. will be entitled to that sum, if sent in before Midsummer, 1841, to R. Melby, Esq., the Registrar of the Diocese.—Christian Intelligence.

BAPTISM OF A DISCIPLE OF ZOROBABEL.

An interesting solemnity took place on the 1st of January, at the close of Divine Service, in the church of the Trinity, at Paris. It was the reception into the church of Christ, of a grown person, son of one of the Mameluks whom Buonaparte brought from Egypt. M. Juillerat, pastor, and president of the Consistory of Paris, administered the ordinance of baptism. The person who thus has professed himself a Christian, was brought up in the religion of Zoroaster, (the fire-worship, or that of the sun, either ultimately or as a pretended symbol).—Archives du Christianisme.—Idid.

DISSEMINATION OF THE OPIUM.

The sight of this proclamation, confirmed us in my previous intention, to proceed to the Bogue, on the first arrival of a ship to my command, to witness the progress of destroying the Opium, and to seek a conference with the Commissioners, respecting the existing and the apprehended difficulties.—The Moravia coming in on the 14th, I proceeded to her the following day, the Bogue, with two friends, and on anchoring at noon, the 17th, sent a card to any of the naval officers of the Chungking station, asking the necessary permission. The card was duly conveyed to the Commissioner and the request promptly granted. At 10 A. M. (the 17th) we left the ship, in our own boat, escorted by several barges, and proceeding up the channel east of the Begoe forts, some 5 or 6 miles, reached at 11, the spot where the drug is being destroyed, and where the Commissioner has his temporary residence. We found the spot to be an enclosure of some 200 feet square, well palisaded, the side opposite (away from) the river, being occupied by most buildings, for storing the Opium, &c. The larger part of the bare ground, was covered by three vans of perhaps 75 feet by 150 each, opening by sluices into the river. The effects of Opium, after being re-weighed, and broken up in the presence of Civil officers, were brought down to the vans; the contents, ball after ball broken down and crumbled upon platforms raised on high benches above the water and then pushed by the feet of the coolies into the receptacle beneath. A large number of men were employed in thus macerating the balls for some days with long rakes, until the whole had become a trifolium mud, when the sluices was raised, and the van emptied in the river. Every precaution seemed to be used by the officers to ensure the complete destruction of the drug, the spot being well guarded, the workmen ticketed, &c. In fact, we turned from the scene, fully satisfied that the work was being performed with right faithfulness, and much disposed to wonder, that a while Christian Governments are growing and farming this delicious drug, this pagan monarch should nobly disdain to enrich his treasury with a sale, that could not fall short of 8p. drs. 20,000,000.

Have we any where on record, a finer rebuke administered by Pagan integrity to Christian degeneracy?—Englishman, Aug. 15.

TRANSMISSION OF MAIL TO RUSSIA.

London East India and China Association.

Courier's Court, Cornhill, 15th June, 1899.

W. LAMSON, Esq.,

Esq., the Chamber of Commerce, Calcutta.

SIR,—It is with pleasure that I am acquainted you, for the information of your Chamber, that the communication between Her Majesty's Government, and that of France, alluded to in my last, has been signed at Paris, and the ratification duly made here, so that a safe and speedy transmission of the overland mails will now be bound. The principal stipulations are:

That the Government of the Queen of Great Britain shall enable in the Post Office of France the conveyance, in mail bags or closed boxes, of the correspondence coming from the East Indies, destined for the United Kingdom, and vice versa, whenever the abovementioned correspondence shall pass through France; but the British Government reserves to itself at all times the right of causing, whenever it shall think proper, the abovementioned correspondence, to be conveyed, either between Alexandria and Malta, or between Malta and Marseilles, or between Alexandria and Marseilles, by vessels freighted or employed for that purpose by its orders, or by packets of the Royal Navy, Article 1.

The French Government engages to effect the conveyance of the mails in the following manner:—By steam packets of 100 horse power, belonging to the Government, which shall leave Alexandria on the 7th, 17th, and 27th, and Marseilles on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of each month; and between Calais and Marseilles by mail coaches. Art. 3.

The duration of the passage from Alexandria to Marseilles, including the time necessary for the transshipment and for the purification, if necessary, of the correspondence at Malta, shall not, except under uncontrollable circumstances, exceed 345 hours, or 14 days and 15 hours, and from Marseilles to Alexandria, including the time necessary for the transshipment of the correspondence at Malta, 300 hours, or 12 days, and 12 hours. Art. 4.

The distance between Marseilles and Calais shall be performed by the mail coaches of the French Post Office in 102 hours, or 4 days and 8 hours. Art. 5.

The mails to and from the French territory sealed with the seal of the Post Office of the East India Company, or with the seal of the British Post Office. With a view to exempt the correspondence coming from the East Indies from the operation of purification, to which it would otherwise be subjected by the Sanitary Regulations, the cases shall be made of plate, iron or tin, and shall be hermetically closed. Art. 6.

The cases shall be accompanied by a courier, who shall keep under his special care the dispatches and mails of Her Majesty's Government, and who shall have the right to be present at the purification of the correspondence, whenever it shall take place, and at all other operations to which the correspondence may be subjected. Art. 7.

The couriers of the British Post Office, who shall accompany on board the French Mediterranean packets, the mails, may receive or deliver either at Malta, or at any other station, at which the said packets shall touch, mail bags from or for Great Britain, &c., subject to the operation of Sanitary Regulations. Art. 14.

Such are the features of the new and highly important measure, and which cost this Committee eighteen months of anxiety and labor to effect, and they trust you will give this communication all the publicity you can for the information of the Indian community.

The possibility of mis-sending letters by way of Falmouth, although marked via Marseilles, which has frequently happened, and been complained of, is now at an end; and the inconvenience formerly experienced here part of the correspondence coming by way of France, and the mail by way of Gibraltar, will no longer be felt. The mail and the Government despatches will arrive together, and there is every reason to believe without any increase in the postage.

A copy of the convention shall be sent to you by the first vessel that leaves here, which plan will be followed where papers are bulky, and with our despatches, except on very special occasions.

I remain, Sir, your very obedient humble servant.

MEMOIR OF BHEEM SEIN.

The death of Rungjee Singh is an event which has been chronicled in full detail in all the newspapers and Akhbars of India, and the circumstances which have attended it, and the character of the Chief will be discussed in the broad pages of the Times, and probably in most of the periodicals of Europe. In his reign he reigned one month and two days from the date of that event, and his death has occurred among the famous men of this generation, which seems hitherto to have excited very little notice, and the Chief ranks perhaps next to Rungjee Singh, among the few who will most figure in history. We allude to General Bheem Sein Thappah, who, for more than thirty years administered the entire sovereignty of Nepal. This Chief owed his rise to the revolution and barbarous fray in which Bajah Suddha Bahadur of Nepal, was slain with many of the principal nobles, as he was in full Durbar, in 1803. Bheem Sein happened to be out of the province chamber for the moment in which the outbreak commenced, and perceiving at a glance on looking in, what had occurred, he hastened to the Rane's palace, and placing him and the slain Rajah's son in security, proclaimed the latter as King; the name of Kirmann Jod Vikram Shah, and his mother, as Regent; thus obtaining for himself the situation of Premier. He had held this situation about nine years when the earthquake occurrence was called into action by a war with the British, commenced at once in all parts of the frontier of Nepal. At this time he may be said to have held a joint rule like that of the two emperors of ancient Rome over the Nepanese territory, which extended from the Sutledge to the Teesta, and the Western half being governed with equal authority by Cumar Singh Thappa, his kinsman, and close friend of Bheem Sein, during the early part of their careers. The hill territory governed by Cumar Singh was lost to Nepal in the war, and that high-minded Chief survived for a short time only, the disgrace and ruin which he fell on him. The ancient territory of Nepal was saved by the measures and policy of Bheem Sein, and in the latter part of the war, and more extended and more arduous than any of the war, in 1816, the young Rajah proclaimed in his country of age, and the eyes of the world were upon him to see whether, after that event, he would be able to retain his position. In 1816, however, (in November) the Rajah was suddenly attacked by small pox, and died after a short illness, leaving the present Rajah of Nepal, an infant. This emergency secured to Bheem Sein uninterrupted reign for the next minority, and delayed the struggle of faction for twenty years. In the course of this long administration, Bheem Sein did more for Nepal; and the regular army of the State was brought to a condition of discipline which excited the wonder of very competent judges when Maharajah Singh, the nephew of Bheem Sein, came down to Calcutta in the season 33-36 upon a mission, the object of which were not then understood, and which he accompanied besides the regular army, the population of Nepal was organized into a militia, which enables the Rajah to call into the field a larger proportion of the male population than the most warlike nation of Europe can boast of.

Bheem Sein's administration, though vigorous, and to a degree partial, was marked by no acts of cruelty. We have heard of no deaths by execution for political offences, and whilst he governed Nepal, the state has often been cited as the one in which justice was best administered according to Hindoo Law and by Brahminical Institutions. Bheem Sein also was a great encourager of the arts; he built for himself a palace of some magnificence, a picture of which we recollect to have seen in the possession of Mr. James Princep, to whom he sent it in acknowledgment of attentions paid to some Nepanese visitors at Benares; he was great also of the skill of the artist, and sent one to Calcutta a rifle made in the valley of Nepal, and exactly imitated from one presented by the Government as scarcely to be distinguishable. Upon the present Rajah's reaching the years of maturity, the intrigues commenced to which ultimately Bheem Sein has fallen a sacrifice. There is reason to believe, that the mission of Marthab Singh to Calcutta was planned for the double purpose of ascertaining, as far as might be, the disposition of the British Government towards the Thapsa party, and further of thwarting the plots then at work to undermine Bhoom Sena, its head, for the opposing faction would scarcely venture to bring matters to extremity against him, while his nephew was beyond reach at the head of the elite of the Nepal army; but if such were the objects of the mission, the effect was but temporary, nor could it have been otherwise. Very shortly after the return of Marthab Singh, the Rajah, solicited by his elder Rane, a viceroy who had thrown himself into the hands of the Paoli faction, the old enemies,—we may say the laconic enemies,—of the Thapsa, renewed Bhoom Sena and all the members of his family from their appointments, and Bhoom Sena, with his nephew, was thrown into confinement. The Paoli faction strenuously objected that the old Chief should be put to death, but the Thapsa faction had a partisan in the Rajah's younger wife, whose influence so far prevailed that the Rajah temporized between the two parties, awaiting for two years to name any Prime Minister. During this interval the junger Rane's party at one time prevailed so far as to procure the liberation of Bhoom Sena and his nephew, and the employment of the latter in the important mission to Lahore, in which we saw him engaged during the past year. Marthab Singh, we believe, is still in Lahore, and to this circumstance was probably his safety. In the early part of this year the struggle of factions at the Rajah's court, and, as usual, the most violent prevailed. Ram Jung Paoli was nominated minister, and his first act was to throw Bhoom Sena again into prison. He next attacked the royal physicians of Bhoom Sena's mission, who had attended the Rajah who died in 1816. Two of these were put to torture, and died under the infliction. Accusations were set up, founded on false declarations, charging Bhoom Sena, with swaying, through the means of these physicians, the Rajah, who died of small pox, by poison. Yet the strength of these (without any regular trial we believe,) Bhoom Sena was put in prison, and sent at first to an unhealthy prison. A short time ago, however, he was brought back, and subjected to torture and every form of indignity, till the spirit of the old Chief would bear it no longer; he attempted suicide by cutting his throat,—and died of the wound after two days on the 29th ultimo. He was the son of Haussa Singh Thapsa, who was Governor of Palpa, on the G. R. frontier side, during the war. We are not informed accurately of his age, but guess it must be somewhere about sixty. His career, therefore, has been exactly simultaneous with that of the Lahore Chief, for whom sixty years were flown from the Ramparts of Fort William. The one has died in a prison; the other, on the throne of his own ruling, surrounded by an army and a population filled with the theme of his glory, and testifying a loyalty and affection seldom witnessed in the East. But what is this point of circumstance to the candid historian? On the page of history the balance of fame will settle between these rival Chiefs,—and if it should ultimately settle in the favour of the Lion of the Punjab, he will owe it more to the position his dominions occupy, which has drawn upon him a larger share of the gaze of the world, than to any intrinsic superiority over his rival in character or in the knowledge of the art of governing mankind.—Englishman, August 12.

MR. PARKER'S SPEECH AT THE STRAM MEETING.

Mr. Parker.—My Lord and Gentlemen,—I have been entrusted with a resolution which I solicit your permission to read, it is as follows:—

That the position of the question, when the last Mail was despatched, demands that this meeting should reiterate, in the strongest manner possible, the unabated desire which pervades the nation, and the public in general, for the immediate establishment of the communication, and the adoption of every resolution to maintain to use every means in their power to obtain it.

Before submitting this resolution to the sense of the meeting, I would crave permission to offer a few remarks, which I hope may appear not inapplicable to its tenor. In submitting these remarks I shall bear in mind, as far as possible, the excellent advice we have just received from our Right Reverend Chairman, so just in itself, so worthy of attention, in proceeding from his lips. I shall abstain as much as possible from comments; I shall confine myself as much as possible to facts. Comments, however true, may, as His Lordship observes, create unpleasant and unfriendly feelings; facts can have, or ought to have, no such effect.

Since we last met in this hall, another season has elapsed of depressing and humiliating failure in the present imperfect scheme of Steam Navigation between Great Britain and India. That is a fact.

At this moment every hour is worth a week of ordinary time. A commercial crisis of an unparalleled nature, and involving immense interests, has occurred in China. A momentous war is waging on our frontier. On two others the storm seems gathering, and clouds of threatening hostility hang darkly in the interior of our Empire, for such I may say is Jodhpore, there is another conflict to all appearance approaching. These, my Lord, these, gentlemen, I think I may call facts!

Between the United States of America and our native country, the most recent, called the Great Western, the Liverpool, and British Queen, and there may be many others, are breaking their magnificent way through the storms, over the foaming sea, amidst the lumbering lee of the Great Atlantic—stopped by no obstacle, triumphing over every difficulty, and carrying on their intercourse between the old world and the new, almost with the regularity and precision of clock work. This, my Lord, is no comment—it is a fact!

While an crisis is hovering over British Asia, such, perhaps, as no man has yet seen—while every hour is precious, and thick coming every speed—speed—speed—while the glorious vessels, I have alluded to, are going in and fro with the rapidity, and the certainty of great creatures of the sea, conquering the mountain waves and the adverse wind, the momentous dispatches of this Government, on which may hang the fate of millions—the thousands of letters fraught with the hopes, the wishes, the fortunes of an immense public—are painfully sounding through the Syrian deserts, with very little chance, to my mind, considering the state of that part of Asia, of ever reaching their destination; or are beating about on the ocean in two sailing vessels, despatched on voyages of discovery, sent, in short, to make the interesting and pleasing experiment, of how speedily sailing vessels might reach Aden against that monsoon, which has at length been confessed, the efficient strainers provided for the service “could not look at.” This is really a state of things,—but I remember our excellent Chairman's exhortation—gentlemen, have I stated any thing but facts?

I have still another curious fact or two which may not be unworthy of your attention, and they bear upon the subject of my resolution.

I find in a statement published here Lord William Bentinck's Select Committee, by Sir John Lubbock, in 1837, the following passages.

“It appears the Committee will permit me to read them.

First.—A despatch, dated on the 10th of September, 1836, which the home authorities received from the Government of Bombay; it is enclosed in these words.

“We beg leave to offer to your Honourable Court our congratulations on the rapidly with which your wishes have of late been conveyed to all parts of your Indian possessions. The three last Overland Mails have brought despatches from London to Bombay in 38, 43 and 44 days; and those intended for Calcutta have been forwarded in 10 days. We have witnessed the energetic impulse this early intelligence has given to the mercantile interest, and the unbounded satisfaction it has diffused throughout all classes of the community, &c., &c., &c.”

Now there is some ambiguity in the term “despatches” in the above passage. I construe it, however, as any plain man would, as having reference to what interests the public at large, viz. the Overland Mails, which, I conceive, are said on the 10th September, 1836, to have been “of late” conveyed to Calcutta in ten days. Gentlemen, I have had drawn up a little paper here which shows that from the 1st of June to the 18th September, 1836, the date of the letter quoted, the Overland Mails reached Calcutta from Bombay in fifteen days—in fifteen days and a quarter—in sixteen days and a half—in fifteen days and a quarter—in fourteen days and a quarter, twelve days and a half, and thirteen days and a half; but on one occasion in ten days. These are curious facts—facts they are. First I cannot reconcile them as owing, no doubt, to my want of apprehension.

Secondly.—On the 30th March, 1837, a letter was addressed to the President of the Board of Control, which will be found at page 18 of the Minutes of Evidence before the Select Committee. The letter says:—

“The Court are aware that it will be necessary to promote, by every possible means, facility and quickness of communication between Bombay and Calcutta, and Madras; and they have observed, by recent intelligence, that the Government of India has adopted arrangements for the acceleration of the dock, by which packets may be conveyed from Bombay to Calcutta in from eight to ten days, and to Madras in about seven days, and which the Court consider to be a much more rapid and certain, and unquestionably more economical mode of communication than a Steam conveyance.”

My Lord—Gentlemen—this is a happy announcement; but how has it been fulfilled? I put many other failures (unavoidable failures)—failures inseparable from the very scheme of sending the English mails, overland from Bombay.) I say, I put many other failures out of the question, I only contrast your notice to that under which we are now suffering. The Tepter left Aden with the English Mail on the 10th, and reached Bombay on the 27th ultimo. The first letters by that vessel reached us—neither in eight or ten—but in sixteen days, after the arrival of the Mail at Bombay! The last letters by that vessel reached us—neither in eight or ten—but in twenty-one days after their arrival at Bombay! Gentlemen,—do you desire any further commentary upon the passage I have quoted? If you do, it must be offered by some more competent individual. I confine myself to a simple statement of facts.

CANONIZATION.—"In this valley of vision (the Sottorosso of San Pubbia Malta) were two bodies, which, one of the monks informed me, laid claim to what the papal jule styles canonization, that is, to hold the rank of 'saints,' and stand in the calendar as neofortis. I approached these skeletons.—"There," said the monks, "claim canonization."—"Then what are they doing here?"—"The question is not yet settled at Rome."—"Why?"—"Whether they are really saints."—"How is that?"—"Why, no miracle have yet been wrought by their bones, and their relatives have not been able to defray the heavy expenses of a trial at Rome."—"What trial?"—"Any human body preferring a claim to canonization, must undergo a trial like those in courts of law. An ecclesiastic acts as advocate for the candidate relict, while a second performs the part of a deacon, raising up whenever he can against the candidate, to prevent his attaining the high honour of sainthood. After both parties have finished their statements, the decision is pronounced by an appointed judge."—"And who pays the process?"—"Oh, the friends of the man or woman tried."—"Does the man who sets Daniel's part at the trial, tell him of the candidate's faults?"—"Of course. The man who acted this part at the trial of the bones of St. Francis, alleged against that saint, that he was here by his playing at bowls; but the objection was over-ruled."—"Are the expenses great?"—"Very; in fact, it is far want of money that these two bodies remain here unsanctified."—"Wilson's Greek Mission.

ANNIVERSARIES OF SOCIETIES.

CHURCH PASTORAL AID SOCIETY.—The fourth annual general meeting was held on Tuesday, the 7th May, in the Large Room of Exeter Hall, which was not full. Lord Ashley, President of the society, was in the chair. The Report was read by the Rev. W. Pullen. The new grants during the past official year, amount to 8,938*l.*, and have been made for the maintenance of eighty additional curates, and eight by voluntary, and eight for miscellaneous aid. The total existing grants of the society amount to 10,112*l.* per annum, to 194 members of parishes and districts. Besides the amount of the society's aid, the members have themselves, chiefly from personal resources, guaranteed 2,484*l.*, so that 20,596*l.*, will be made available, for the maintenance of 198 more clergymen, and twenty-nine by residents. There are now engaged in their important labours 113 curates and twenty-two students, and the grants, on their account amount to 10,337*l.* per annum. The income of the society during the year has been about 10,400*l.*, being an increase of 2,400*l.* The grants for curates have directly led to the erection of twelve new churches, or chapels, and to the appropriation of seven chapels formerly used by Dissenters. Motions were proposed or supported by the Bishop of Chester, the Earl of Wiltshire, the Bishop of Ely, Winchester, Landaff, and Rochester, the Rev. Chancellor Rokeby, the Hon. W. Ashley, the Dean of Salisbury, the Rev. Messrs. Tottenham, Harding, and Trevelyan, and Mr. S. Gurney.—Christ. Adc.

EUROPEAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The twenty-first annual meeting of the European (late Continental) Missionary Society, was held in the Lower Room, Exeter Hall, on Saturday, the 11th May. The Hon. Captain V. Harcourt, R. N., was Chairman. The Rev. J. Burrows (Secretary) read the Report, Lord Rayleigh had resigned the presidency. The society has twenty agents (three of whom were engaged during the past year) at present labouring in France, Switzerland, Belgium, and other parts of Europe. Applications had been made for ten other agents. The receipts in the past year amounted to 1,425*l.* 4*l.*, and the expenditure to 1,738*l.* 12*l.* 1*l.* The speakers were the Rev. A. S. Threlwell, the Rev. J. Cunningham, W. Long, Esq., Capt. Layard, Mons. Pasteur Lourde de la Place, the Rev. J. Burrows, the Rev. F. Trevelyan, and W. Anderson, Esq.—Ibid.

UNITARIAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The eighth anniversary meeting was held in the Lower Room at Exeter Hall, on Monday, the 6th May, at noon, Captain F. Vernon Harcourt in the chair. The Rev. A. S. Threlwell, the secretary, read the Report. Receipts 3,030*l.* 6*l.* 7*l.*, something less than last year. Motions were moved or seconded by the Rev. Messrs. J. L. Galsworthy, E. H. Rhodes, W. L. Bousfield, J. F. Whitney, G. W. Phillips, A. S. Threlwell, and J. J. Cunningham, Esq.—Ibid.

SAILORS' HOME ASYLUM, AND FLOATING CHURCH.—The annual meeting of the friends and supporters of the Sailors' Home, Destitute Sailors' Asylum, and Episcopal Floating Church Societies, was held at the Hammer-square Rooms on Tuesday week. Admiral Hawker was called to the chair. Capt. Elliot, R.N., read the Report. The total number of men received into the Sailors' Home during the past year was 1,342, being an increase of seventy-nine. The number of men returning after having lodged in the Home formerly, was greater than in any previous year. The greatest number of inmates at one time, was 120, being an increase of nineteen on previous years. The Rev. C. C. Miles, the chaplain, having been appointed to a larger curacy, the Church Pastoral-Aid Society had generously undertaken to supply the stipend for his successor. The receipts, including 1,601*l.* paid by the seamen, amounted to 3,968*l.*, and a balance of 257*l.* was due to the treasurer. In the Destitute Sailors' Asylum, the number relieved during the past year, was 1,131. The receipts amounted to 1,084*l.* 2*l.* 4*l.*, and there was a small balance left in the treasurer's hands. For the Episcopal Floating Church, the receipts amounted to 240*l.*, and there was a balance of 3*l.* 6*l.* in the treasurer's hands. The Earl of Harrowby, Lord Rokeby, Capt. Baskerville, Capt. A. Chapman, the Rev. S. Sidley, the Hon. Captain Wellesley, Admiral Oliver, and Admiral Young, addressed the meeting.—Ibid.

EDUCATION.

SCHOOL IN OXFORD.—Prof. Daubeny has published a second letter to the Members of Convocation, wherein he has adduced further evidence in confirmation of his opinions.—"In the statement," he observes, "which I laid before you a few days ago, concerning the decreased attendance on the Chemical Lectures, I expressed my belief that the classes of other Professors who lecture on subjects alien to those required in the Examination Schools, would be found to have experienced a corresponding diminution. I have since been supplied by three of my colleagues with more specific statements with reference to this point, from which it would appear, that the falling off has in one case been considerably greater, and in the other two, equally great with that in my own. Thus, Dr. Kidd reports, that during the period intervening between the years 1819 and 1825, the number of his pupils amounted to two hundred and eighty-eight, averaging twenty-nine yearly; whereas, between 1829 and 1838, their amount was only one hundred and seventy-five, or seventeen and a half yearly. For the last five years, however, the ratio of decrease has greatly exceeded the above calculation; for in 1833, in 1836, the number of his pupils amounted only to six; in 1835, to ten; in 1838, to four; in 1837, to ten; and in 1838, to ten. Prof. Rigaud informs me, that from 1816 to 1825 the number of his pupils contributed by the whole University averaged forty-two annually; whereas, from 1825 to the present time, it scarcely exceeded eight. Here also, as in the case of the Anatomical Lectures, and in that of my own, the diminution appears to have been going on in an accelerated ratio during the last five or six years; for in 1833 Prof. Rigaud derived from all the other colleges, excepting Christchurch, only four pupils; in 1834, six; in 1835, none at all; in 1836, two; in 1837, five; and again, in 1838, none at all. With respect to the Lectures in Geology and Mineralogy, Prof. Buckland has communicated to me the following particulars:—"In confirmation of the statement set forth in your letter of the 24th of February to the Members of Convocation, respecting the rapid decrease of attendance on the Public Lectures of Professors in this University during the last eight years, I wish it to be known, that I have experienced a similar and nearly simultaneous diminution in the number of persons attending my courses both in Geology and Mineralogy. This decrease began about seven years ago, the average number of pupils since that time having been nearly one-half less than during more than fifteen years preceding it." These are startling facts—and we trust they will not have been urged in vain.—Ithensian.

HIGHBURY COLLEGE.—We have much pleasure in announcing that Highbury College has obtained, in addition to the services of the Rev. Dr. Henderson, Theological Tutor, those of the Rev. J. H. Gwynne, of Norwich, as Resident Tutor, with the departments of Mental Philosophy, Mathematics, &c., and those of Mr. W. Smith, of University College, as Classical Tutor.—Pat.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—The first examination for the degree of Bachelor of Arts was held at Somerset-house during four successive days of the last week. The enclosed is the list of those who have been admitted in the degree.—First Division.—Messrs. Barnes, University College; Brown, U. C.; Griffiths, U. C.; Jennings, U. C.; Lee, U. C.; O'Loughlin, U. C.; Proctor, King's College; * Read, University College; Midley, U. C.; Spalding, U. C.; Tennant, U. C.; Waley, U. C.; Second Division.—Messrs. Ball, King's Coll.; Blackton, University College; Butterworth, King's College; Case, University College; Group, King's College.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE QUEEN AND LADY PARK.—Many stories have been told about the recent fall given by the Queen. We have heard the following from an eye-witness—namely, that Her Majesty made a point of giving a most cordial shake of the hand to Lady Peel, as if anxious to prove that her political sentiments did not interfere with her private feelings. We mention this little incident, first, as an unalloyed trait in Her Majesty's character, and, secondly, as an example generally to the ladies of the United Kingdom, who have lately allowed politics to obtain much too great an influence over them, even to the smothering of private life, the poisoning of friendship, and the souring of the very best feelings of the human heart.—Liverpool Chronicle.

SIR JAMES CLACK. has at length been dismissed the court. He asked leave to travel for a short time, and permission was granted. The truth is, his rude attack upon the honour of Lady Flora Hastings caused him to be cut in almost every circle; and for his own peace of mind it was necessary for him to retire. He was exceedingly indolent, and he will suffer for it.—Christ. Adv.

THE LATE SPEAKER, now Baron Danferrine, is descended from the ancient family of Abercromby, of Hilsenborg, in the county of Perth. The first of the family on record was Humphrey de Abercromby, who obtained a charter from Robert Bruce, in 1315. Sir Alexander Abercromby, of that ilk, had a younger son, Alexander, who settled at Tullibody, in Clackmannanshire, and was father of Sir Ralph Abercromby, who was killed at the battle of Alexandria, in 1801. Baron Abercromby, the eldest son, inherited the title from his mother, in 1821, and is married to a sister of the present Viscount Melville. Lord Danferrine is the third son of the hero of Aboukir, and, we believe, is about 65 years of age. Some of the names sound strangely in English ears, and Tullibody and Birkcubbin may fairly vie in that respect with what was considered at the time the most ridiculous English title—Boutle Wilbraham, of Skelmorale.—Pat.

LIGHTING OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Some experiments have been made in lighting the House of Commons, with what are called the Bude lights, on a plan invented by Mr. Gurney. The effect produced is thus described by the Times.—"The light is now made to descend from the ceiling through glass pipes, out of which the apparatus is so contrived, that the light can with ease be varied from the colour of a pale moonlight to a bright sunlight, or be melted down to a rich autumnal glow; still giving sufficient light, without any unpleasant glare, in every part of the House. The glass through which the light is sent down is fitted air-tight into the bottom of the chandelier; so that no heat can be generated by it in the house; the light radiating from the surface of the chandelier itself; but, compared with the heat and the consumption of atmospheric air by the combustion (or rather the very imperfect combustion) of 240 wax candles, the heat and atmospheric combustion of the new plan are not as far as the body of the house is concerned as 1 to 100. Whatever heat may be generated by the new process, will be carried off through the roof, and never affect the body of the house. In those of our readers who may not be acquainted with the nature of what is called the Bude light, it will suffice to say, that in Mr. Gurney's plan it consists in a number of burners (in each chandelier) supplied with wick and oil, somewhat like the Argand lamp, with the improvement, that in this there is only one circle or cylinder, while in the Argand lamp there are two. Lighted in this state, the lamp would send off a very large and offensive mass of unconsumed carbon; but to prevent the stream of oxygen gas made to pass through the centre of each burner, by which the total combustion of the carbon of the oil and wick takes place; and the light is consequently raised to a beautifully brilliant flame, the intensity of which may be increased according to the volume of the stream of oxygen passed through it; and, as we have already said, the light may be melted as to shade, fancy, or convenience may suggest. From what we saw last night, we think the very clever plan of Mr. Gurney, a vast improvement on the present system; and, as Joe Hume would say, it is a great deal cheaper."—Christ. Adv.

THAMES TUNNEL.—This great national undertaking is rapidly progressing, and the most sanguine expectations are entertained of reaching low water-mark, on the Middlesex shore, before the termination of the summer. The works have now progressed to within thirty-five feet of Trinity low water-mark on the south side, and from the state of the shield and the general appearance of the excavation, it is believed that all danger has been surmounted. When low water-mark is reached, a shaft will be sunk on the Wapping side of the river, and the workmen will continue their labours at both ends of the Tunnel. It is expected that the subterranean communication between Surrey and Middlesex for foot-passengers, will be open in about fifteen months.—Pat.

NATIONAL CONVENTION.—The Delegates to the National Convention assembled in Laurence-street Chapel, Birmingham, on Tuesday; and, after some discussion adopted, and agreed to publish a "Manifesto of the General Convention of the Industrial Classes." This document seems to prepare the working population for a conflict with the Government. Simultaneous meetings are recommended, at which such questions as the following are to be put:—"Whether they will be prepared, at the request of the Convention, to withdraw all sums of money they may individually or collectively have placed in various banks, private banks, or in the hands of any hostile to their just rights. When the meetings proposed have been held, answers to the above questions received, and thus the will of the people ascertained, the Convention will, after the 1st of July, proceed to carry the will of the People into execution." A Chartist meeting was held at Holloway Head, near Birmingham, on Monday; the numbers of which are variously stated.—Ibid.

O'CONNELL AND BROUGHAM.—At a meeting of the London Freemason Association, held on Monday evening at the Crown and Anchor, Mr. O'Connell was eloquent in praise of the Queen, and in abuse of Sir M. Peel. He levelled a blow at Mr. Hume, which nobly attempted to parry, and was met by an attack on Lord Brougham with a quotation from Sterne. In the course of his speech, some remarks elicited a groan for Lord Brougham, whereupon, says the report, Mr. O'Connell, after eulogising Lord Brougham, said the people ought, in consideration of his vast merits, to look at his faults, as Sterne described the Recording Angel—dropping a tear upon the faults and blotting them out for ever. Lord Brougham had attacked him, he had attacked Lord Brougham; he did not know which had the best of it; but now he was satisfied, and he was done with it.—Christ. Adv.

THE CROYDON RAILROAD was opened on Saturday to the public. At one o'clock the Lord Mayor and a large party accompanied the directors in two trains to Croydon. The service was performed in 20 minutes; the fare is to be 15d., 3d. of which, for each passenger, is to be paid to the directors of the Greenwich railway for the use made of part of that road.—Pat.

A FIRE, which caused loss of life and property, broke out about two o'clock on Monday morning, in the premises of Mr. Uwin, stationer, Duck-lane, near the Mansion-house. The back part of the building was almost consumed before the fire was discovered by the police; and it was only after some delay, that the inmates could be aroused. At length, Mr. and Mrs. Uwin, near their appearance at the window of the third floor, and rescued by ladders belonging to the engines. On Mrs. Uwin exclaiming to the firemen that her children were all in the room which they had escaped from, Dwight, one of the brigade, rushed up the folds to save them; but, just as he had got to the window, the flames shot out from the windows underneath, and he fell to the pavement with tremendous violence, from the height of forty feet; he was conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital, very much injured. Eighteen in great numbers soon arrived, but the fire was not got under it; near five, and the whole of the premises of Mr. Uwin are lost to the ground, and extensive warehouses on each side much damaged also. As soon as the fire was subdued, Mr. Bradshaw, who was on the spot shortly after the commencement, made inquiries, and learnt that nine slept in the house, and that five only were their escape. A number of firemen were set to work to save among the ruins for the bodies; and at about six o'clock three were found burnt to a cinder; one was discovered to be the body of the female servant, and the others Mr. Uwin's children, two boys, aged nine and ten. An apprentice also lost his life. There were no fire-escapes to be had, or perhaps all might have been saved.—Christ. Adv.

DEKELLING.—An address of remembrance from the physicians and clergy of the city of Bath has been presented to Lord Ponsonby, in reference to his recent shift with Mr. Baines, to which his Lordship has returned an answer: from which we quote the following. "His Lordship says—"The law of public opinion—the most influential of the laws of men, and two-fold more so than the law of God—condemns a young man who, when either challenged or publicly insulted, shrinks from a duel, to that scorn and contempt which the imputation of cowardice entails; and I confess that I have been deficient in that exalted moral courage which, in this instance, could alone have enabled me to despise the scoffs of the world and the sneers of my associates."—Ibid.

THE ATTRIBUTES OF FASHIONABLE LIFE.—It is with an intention of starting a paradox, that we here express an admiration of ours, which has frequently floated through our mind during the perusal of these volumes, namely, that if there be one more salient quality than the rest, among the attributes of what is called fashionable life, it is vulgarity. Yes, whatever may be the polished externals of conventional good-manners, the interior intellectual substratum is shrew, inborn, and unimprovable vulgarity. Whether "Chevy-chase" be taken merely for what it presents itself, "a tale of fiction," or for what public fame has given it out, "a tale of real life," it contains in itself ample evidence of this truth. We are not, however, dependent on a single instance for illustrating our position: wherever the interior of the sacred circle is betrayed to the public, either by the unseasonable disclosures of friends, or the deliberate treachery of enemies to vengeance, narrowness of heart, mean selfishness, jealousy, and pursuits, mean motives, mean judgments of others, and mean views of nature and society, press upon our gaze, and broken as order of intellect to which the good, the beautiful, the enlarged, and the liberal, are one vast and unintelligible blank. Without stopping beyond our own letter to analyse some notorious town tale of scandal, or to canvass the multiplied commentaries on circulating in circles of heart, mean and covetous, to vary the ill-renewed and unimproved paltrinesses of the inventors, we need but appeal to our literary experiences, and point to such a work as the too celebrated "Diary" of last year; and it would be difficult in the annals of Covent Garden or of Billingsgate to match the vulgarity of mind there exhibited, both in the story, and in the telling.—Athenaeum.

ABYSSINIAN.—M. d'Aubert has arrived from Abyssinia, and brought with him three of the natives, one of whom, the servant of the hierarchy of Abyssinia, he left at Rome, to be instructed in the principles of the Christian faith. The other two have accompanied him to Paris. One is a boy of nine years old, whom he purchased as a slave, and whom he intends to send back to his native country with a scientific and religious education. The last is a young man, aged eighteen, called Gebra Geyzi—i. e. the servant of my lord. His complexion is very black, but his features are agreeable, and his person good. He was introduced a few evenings since, by M. d'Almeida, at the savoir of M. Joumard, (conservator of the Louvre). The three blacks were richly dressed and robed. Formerly, the inhabitants of Eastern cities rarely visited the capitals of Europe, unless in the fictitious pages of Harlequin, or Montreuil; but now, in addition to the show, we have flocking in upon us native travellers from Egypt, Persia, and Constantinople, all anxious to know the manners of these Christian dogs, whom their forefathers despised.—Adhe-nens.

EDUCATION OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—Mr. Sydney Smith has been lecturing at the Corn Law in the theatre at Cambridge. His first lecture was well received; but the second, on Tuesday, the 14th, was interrupted by a mob of under-graduates of the University, who took possession of the boxes at his right hand, and immediately began to shout and hiss, and blow a giant's horn, crying "Damn the Christians!" "Will you fight?" "Three cheers for the corn-laws!" "Huzzas for Sir Robert Peel!" The townsman, who were in the pit, after much provocation, climbed into the boxes, and a fierce conflict ensued. With the benches which they tore up, the townsman drove the gentlemen out of the theatre. In a quarter of an hour the gentlemen returned with a reinforcement, and renewed the attack; which continued for some time, till they were again fairly killed and beaten out of the theatre. Mr. Smith then finished his lecture.—Christ. Adv.

We observe that there has been offered to our architects a specimen of 2500. for the best, and 1500. for the second best design, for a new public hall at Liverpool, upon which the sum of 200,000. is to be expended, the Corporation giving the land for free. This is a very good example of an architect and an architect, to rival or excel the Birmingham instrument.—Adhe-nens.

ANTARCTIC SOCIETY. March 2.—Professor Wilson in the chair. R. Harding, Esq., was elected a Resident Member. The Secretary read a paper, by Dr. Litzky, relative to the discovery of an settlement in Asensia, one of the Caroline Islands, in the N. lat. He observed, that he had before printed an account of this discovery at Sydney; but he had reason to suppose that too many of his countrymen had read this country. The discovery was recently discovered by M. M. S. Baren. Some time after the discovery, a gentleman proceeded thither, and reported several months—with what object it did not appear. The gentleman reports, that at a place on the island, called Tetra, the ruins of an extensive town are visible, now accessible only by boats, the water coming up to the steps of the houses. The stones are laid artistically, but without cement; and some of the houses are twenty feet in length. They appear, from description, to be of the well-known Cyclopian structure. The walls have doors and windows, and they are built of a stone that appeared to the reporter unlike that of the neighbourhood. The habits of the people of the island are different from those of the other South Sea Islands. The social system there appears to be more developed—the women are upon a more equal footing with the men; many of their customs are more like those of Europeans than have been observed elsewhere in the Pacific. They attribute the founding of these rules to persons departed; but whether of their own or a different race it does not appear. Dr. Litzky, after his arrival in England, has received a letter from Sydney, by which he learns, that Asensia has again been visited by the captain of a whaler, who is on his way to the Antarctic. The whaler, of the name of Arcturion, and who is said to report that the islands about that part of the ocean are covered with ruins.

Dr. Royle then read a paper respecting Vateria Indica, or the varnish and vegetable tallow tree of the Malabar and Canara coasts. The tree has been figured and described by Rhede, and is found in the Wynad and Bednore districts. Mr. S. Dyer stated, in a letter to Dr. Royle, that he knew it grew abundantly, both in the interior and along the coasts. It was called the Piney or Dhoomar tree, and attains a great size, with wood of excellent quality. Its varnish is used on the coasts in a liquid state, but, when dry, is known, in commerce, as Copal and Anime. The tallow is obtained by boiling the seeds in water, when the fatty matter floats at the surface, and becomes solid. An account of this substance was given, by Dr. Babbington, in the Journal of the Royal Institution for 1825, which mentions that it sold, at Mangalore, at 24d. per pound. Dr. Royle stated that he had long been desirous of having the vegetable oils of India examined, as they were both abundant there, and a great demand here. Castor oil, and coco-nut oil, had, for some time, been extensive articles of commerce; linseed and rapeseed had lately become so; but there were many others equally suitable—as was evident by the analyses made by Mr. E. Solly—besides some solid fatty substances.

Like this vegetable tallow, which would be desirable, both for medicinal use, as well as substitutes for animal tallow. This, however, had also been brought from India in January, 1856, and sold for 44s. 6d. per cwt.—approaching the price given for good Russia tallow. Dr. Royle read a letter from Mr. S. Dyer, of the Madras Medical Service, who had long resided at Tellicherry, and was well acquainted with the piney varnish tree, which, he states, will grow readily, even when the branches are put in the ground; and many of the trees were planted, on the road side, in Malabar, about twenty years ago, a period more than is required to bring them to perfection.

Mr. E. Solly then read a short account of the Chemical Properties of the Vegetable Tallow of the Piney Tree. He described it as being, in its most important characters, something between wax and tallow, and well adapted, by its properties, as a substitute for animal tallow, both in the manufacture of candles, and likewise for many other purposes to which that substance is at present exclusively applied. One great advantage which the piney tallow possessed over common tallow, consisted in the absence of any disagreeable smell, either at common temperature, or when burning; and, consequently, when candles made of it were extinguished, they did not emit the highly offensive smell which is always perceived with candles made of animal tallow. In confirmation of its applicability to candle-making, he stated, that Dr. Babbington had placed a pound of this tallow in a practical candle-maker, who had given a most laudatory report, he having succeeded in making good candles of it, which came freely from the mould. Mr. Solly thought, that if it could be obtained at such a price as to admit of its being imported as a substitute for tallow, its important and valuable properties would soon secure a market for it.—Ibid.

ANTIC SOCIETY. March 16.—Prof. Wilson, in the chair. A paper, by Mr. Traill, was read, on the Choores and Phoul-wa, the solid oil of the Bassia latifolia. This paper was somewhat read in part a continuation of the paper read at the last meeting, on the vegetable tallow of Alchornea. The tree producing the Choores is a native of the Alchornea Hills, but grows abundantly in the Gaur Khalee province of Motte, where the oil is largely prepared as an article of commerce; and, being cheaper than lard (clarified butter), is used to adulterate that substance. It is exported to Calcutta and other parts of Hindustan, and is in the original state, and partly as Phoul-wa, which is a mixture of the Choores with a sweet-scented oil. The author described the Choores, when genuine, as being well adapted for burning in lamps, and stated that he had for many years used it in preference to coco-nut oil for that purpose; but, as the natives usually mix the flour of Indian corn with the Choores, it was found necessary to extend to Calcutta, a small quantity of Hindustani oil for light purposes, or about 24d. per lb. Mr. Traill concluded by stating, on the authority of Dr. Royle, that there was every probability that the Bassia latifolia might be successfully cultivated in the plains of India (where its congeners, Bassia latifolia, or Morinda, and Bassia longifolia, or Blupet-tree, flourish so well), as a young Choores tree obtained from the hills, where it is indigenous, flourished for many years at Saharnpore. Mr. L. Newman stated that most of his knowledge of the properties and uses of the Phoul-wa, as derived from Mr. B. Blake, a gentleman well known for his scientific attainments, and who for many years held the office of Assay Master to the mint at Fettehglur. Since then, Mr. Newman has seen it frequently employed as an external application, and had himself employed it successfully in cases of rheumatism, chronic pain, and stiffness of the joints. He considered it worthy the attention of European surgeons as a substitute for the unctuous substances in common use, and for which its valuable properties, and unchangeable nature well adapted it. Mr. E. Solly described this substance as being a solid oil, similar to the vegetable tallow of the piney-tree, but containing more resin or fluid oil, and hence well designated as a tallow. He stated that it was solid at all ordinary temperatures, became soft when heated to 100° Fahr.; and required a heat of over 120° to melt it completely. He showed a specimen of the Phoul-wa, or preparation of Choores and sweet oil, which was brought over five years ago by Mr. Traill, to consist of 60 parts of solid oil, 34 of fluid oil, and 6 parts of vegetable impurities; these latter, however, both from the smallness of the quantity and their nature, appeared to be derived from the seeds, and not to be impurities introduced. A specimen of the Choores, which had been in this country upwards of thirteen years, and which was slightly altered by keeping, contained 82 per cent. of solid oil. He found that by boiling a portion of this slightly altered substance in alcohol, the small and the pale yellow colour which it had acquired through age were removed, and it then appeared as a perfectly white substance, of a rather greater consistency than tallow, burning very well, and having a very beautiful appearance when cast into moulds; he had little doubt it would prove a valuable addition to the solid oils already known in commerce.—Ibid.

DEATH OF THE KING-QUEEN OF NAPLES.—We regret to announce that the Countess de Lipone, ex-Queen of Naples, died on the 18th inst. at Florence, in the arms of her brother, the Count de Montfort, and his daughter, the Countess de Rasponi.

The ex-Queen sat under the same disease as destroyed her brother, the Emperor Napoleon, and their father—cancer in the stomach. She was dolorous, with occasional lucid intervals, during the last fifteen hours. The two sons of the Countess de Lipona are in the United States, where they are residing to her sisters; and their absence from her is said to have greatly increased the bitterness of her last moments. It will be remembered that last year the French Chambers voted an annual income of 100,000*fr.* to the Countess, as a compensation for certain claims of property which she had come to Paris to support. The Countess was born the 26th of March, 1782, and was therefore in her 98th year.—Galignani.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE PRESIDENT IN COUNCIL.

Fort William, 12th August, 1880.

No. 186 of 1880.—Governor having resolved, in the General Department, to sanction the formation of a Secondary School in conjunction with the Medical College of Calcutta, for the instruction of Native Doctors, for the Military and Civil Branches of the Service, the following Rules relating to admission to the School, and to the terms of Service, which have been established by the Honourable the President in Council, are published for general information, and will take effect from the 1st of October 1880.

1. The School will be thrown open for the admission of any persons desirous of acquiring Medical knowledge, as well as for the instruction of those who enter the Institution under the engagements and terms of service hereinafter specified.

2. To the first of these classes of persons the enrolled Natives do not apply; it being understood that such persons resort to the Institution in order to qualify themselves for eventually undertaking private practice in the Medical profession.

3. The class of students intended for the Subordinate Medical Service under Government, is to consist of not more than fifty persons, admissible on the 1st of October 1880; and in the following and other subsequent years respectively twenty additional pupils are to be admitted.

4. The qualification required of these Students at the time of admission is, that they shall be able to read and write the Hindoostanee language in the Devanagari, or Persian character, their capability being certified by a Native Magistrate, and further ascertained by examiners before the Examiners of the College of Fort William. The holders of the Report of the Examiners, the Council of the Medical College will select such as possess the best certificates, restricting admission to the numbers of Students above specified.

5. Hindoos and Mahomedans are equally admissible, who duly qualified, on the sole condition that they be of respectable character. The qualifications are equal, a preference will be shown to the native use of either of Native Hindoos and other respectable persons in the Service of Government. Candidates from the Provinces of Assam and Arakan will be specially considered.

6. The Students are to be regularly enlisted as Soldiers, and to be subject to the Articles of war for the duration of the Native Army.

7. Students are admissible into the Institution at from 16 to 22 years of age; and upon their admission they are to enter into an engagement, to serve the Government as Native Doctors, as vacancies may occur, for a period of not less than seven years from the date of their leaving the Institution in their capacity, unless prevented acting that period by physical inability, proved before a Medical Committee, and certified accordingly. After a service of seven years, they may demand their discharge at the close of seven years.

8. From the date of admission into the Institution, the Students will receive daily money at the public charge, at the rate of (3) Five Rupees per mensem, to be continued to them during the absence of their absence at the Institution, and to be drawn in Monthly Allowance by the Secretary to the Medical College.

9. It will at all times be in the power of the Council of the Medical College to discontinue any individual Student, on being satisfied that from dullness, idleness, negligence, or misconduct, he is not likely to profit by the instruction given at the Institution, or to become properly qualified for the exercise of the duties for which he is designed.

10. The Students will be required, before they obtain admission to the Service as Native Doctors, to pass an examination before the Examiners of the Medical College upon whose report of their qualifications for the public service, made through the College Council to the Board, the Students will be appointed to the situation of Native Doctors on the occurrence of vacancies, in the same manner as Native Doctors have hitherto been appointed.

11. The pay of Native Doctors on appointment to the Service, fixed at (20) Twenty Company's Rupees a month in Garrison or at a Field Station, and (25) Twenty-five Company's Rupees a month in the Field, of which sums (15) Five Rupees may be retained at the time, and added when on leave of absence from Corps and Stations.

12. Although the engagement of Native Doctors to serve in the Institution, does not extend beyond seven years, yet in the event of such Students continuing to serve, the allowances will after seven years, be increased to (25) Twenty-five Company's Rupees in Garrison or at a Field Station, and (30) Thirty Rupees in the Field, provided the Student does not under whom such Native Doctor may be engaged at the time, give a certificate, that the general character and professional conduct of the individual deserves this indulgence. The certificate is to be countersigned by the Superintending Surgeon of the Corps or Circle.

13. Pensions will be granted to Native Doctors at the following rates, and under the conditions of service herein specified:

A Native Doctor who, from wounds or injuries received on Service, shall become no longer fit to serve, will be entitled, at any period not less than fifteen years to an Invalid Pension of Twelve Rupees per mensem, after fifteen years, to one-half of his Field Pay if in the Military, and of his Garrison Pay if in the Civil branch of the Service; after twenty years, to the whole of his Pay, provided that in every case the inability of a Native Doctor to serve, as occasioned by wounds or injuries as received, be duly certified by the usual Medical Committee for invalidity.

14. A Native Doctor, if in the service under ordinary circumstances, shall be entitled to perform his duties, will be entitled at the expiration of fifteen years to a Pensionary Provision of Ten Rupees per mensem; and after Twenty-two years, to one-half of his Field or Garrison Pay, respectively.

15. Native Doctors attached in Civil Stations are liable to serve with the Army, when so directed in General Orders, and the same advantage in every respect will thereupon be extended to them when thus serving as to Native Doctors attached to Corps.

The foregoing Rules are applicable only to those Native Doctors who may be educated at the Secondary School of the Calcutta Medical College.

THE STATE OF THE POLICE.—Among the various objects which will require the attention of Lord Auckland, on his return to the Presidency, there is no one of more pressing importance than the present state of the Police, which has at length reached such a pitch of inefficiency, as to make it doubtful whether there be any such thing as a Police. A robbery is now so every day an occurrence, that it ceases to attract attention, except when accompanied with circumstances of peculiar atrocity. Bengal, and more especially that portion of it, which forms the circle round the metropolis, is one unvaried scene of outrage and plunder. No property is any longer considered as secure. To such a degree of audacity have the disturbers of the public peace attained, that in a variety of instances their depredations are carried on by torch light, as if in utter mockery of the Police. The evil increases day by day. The papers teem with reports of the most daring robberies committed by large bodies of armed men, under the very eye of the public officers. The disturbers of the public peace are no longer confined to those of the lowest caste; men of aristocratic birth and pretensions, will be found in almost every instance to be the abettors, if not the contrivers, of these plundering expeditions. A grand organization of robbers has grown up in the country, which embraces men of all classes; and it is daily increasing in strength and audacity. There are regular receiving houses kept by men whose respectability of appearance would lull the suspicion, even of an infinitely more efficient Police than any of which the country can boast. The late Mr. Busek, Magistrate of Serampore, then whom a more active and energetic officer never took office in India, made it his particular duty to ferret out the receivers of stolen goods; and he discovered that both banks of the river, from Hooghly to Calcutta, were studded with houses in which stolen goods were regularly deposited, and which were kept by men above ordinary suspicion. Thus a confederacy exists, both of rogues and of receivers, too strong for the present Police establishment. And as the efforts of the State have failed to secure to the people, the primary blessing of a civilized government—security of property—it is not to be wondered at if the people should begin to lose confidence in the institutions under which they live. This mistrust is no longer veiled under indistinct murmurs, but is beginning to be boldly avowed in the Native papers of this Presidency. It is openly asserted, week after week, that whatever other blessings the British Government may have conferred on the country, it has failed in its efforts to give adequate protection to life and property.

This lamentable state of things is not to be attributed to want. The past history of India abundantly shews, that whenever the peasantry have been driven to desperation, either by grinding oppression, or by the calamities of the season, they have taken themselves to plunder; and the existence of suffering has been too clearly indicated by the increase of robberies. But at no period has plenty smiled on the districts most infected with robberies, so richly as at the present time. The cause lies in the weakness, the inefficiency, the oppressions of the Police, which so far from being a terror to evil doers, is dreaded only by the peaceful and honest. It was impossible that the continued operation of such a Police, should not bring on the existing state of things; and we have only to perpetuate the system, to produce a total disorganization of society. The slightest glance at the conduct of our Police agency will confirm this assertion. Whenever a robbery is committed, and the Darogah, or Police Officer, is called in, he sets himself in the very first instance to threaten the peaceful inhabitants with vexatious proceedings, in order to extort money from them. He has only to pronounce the words, "I must send the witnesses in this case up to the Presence," and it acts like a talisman; it opens the closest fist; it fills his purse to overflowing. The Presence dwells, perhaps, at the distance of forty or fifty miles from the village; and there is no man so blind as not to perceive how much cheaper it is to conciliate the Darogah, than to quit home and family, and dance attendance at the Court for a month, and fee his hungry officers, who fatten on crime. Thus the Darogah follows in the wake of the robbers, and diligently gleans what they may have left. This is the case universally; it is one of the few rules which have no exception. Hence, the Natives have divided their enemies into two classes; the robbers, who plunder by night; and the Darogah, who plunders by day. The thieves are the best friends of the Darogahs, and the Darogahs of the thieves. It is a natural consequence of this vicious system, that the great object of all men throughout the country should be to conceal depredations, and that the visit of the Darogah should be considered a greater calamity than that of the robbers. It is an inevitable consequence of this state of things, that the robbers should feel secure of impunity, and that their depredations should increase in proportion to the feeling of security with which the inefficiency of the Police inspires them.

The evil has increased to a frightful extent; and it is daily increasing. The organization is becoming more extensive and ramified, and depredations are marked by increasing audacity. We require a bold, strong, instantaneous remedy. It is no palliative that will any longer answer the purpose. Government must at once take the field, as they have done in the case of Thugger. And the work must be done by European Officers. It must be obvious to every one, that if the suppression of that crime had been left to Native Officers, it would, as in the case of Dacoities, have increased. Doubtless higher pay, the prospect of honour, the certainty of disgrace, and a better system of superintendence, would, in time, make the Darogahs honest men, and good conservators of the peace; but they have too long been habituated to consider power in no other light than as the means of accumulating wealth, to be able suddenly to lay aside these habits; and while they were employed in gradually acquiring honesty of principle, the country would be wasted to a skeleton by the disease which is now consuming its vitals. We require a vigorous effort for a pressing emergency. How far the system which was organized for the suppression of Thugger has been found to answer for the suppression of Dacoities, His Lordship will have learnt before he quits the Western Provinces. Whether the extension of Major Sleeman's agency to this part of the country is advisable or not, we have not the means of learning; but of this we are certain, that a vigorous plan of operations, which should command the confidence of the people, and secure their co-operation, would, in three or four years, eradicate the present race of dacoits, and enable Government to organize a new and permanent system on a reformed basis, which should effectually prevent their revival.

THE INSOLVENT COURT.—The Harkurs stated last week, that the Insolvent Court had latterly augmented the expenses attending its proceedings, to the great inconvenience of the public; that a creditor of one of the fallen houses having the small sum of forty Rupees to receive, as his share of the dividend, was informed that it would require an outlay of eighty Rupees to obtain it. It was also stated that the expense of obtaining the benefit of the Act had been increased from Three Hundred to a Thousand Rupees. The former assertion will readily gain credence; for it seems to fall in with the spirit of English law, as administered in our own happy land. The second statement, mentioned by our contemporary, requires examination, before it is received as fact. It is the natural tendency of all Courts to increase the expense of justice, and to consider the advantages of its own officers with more complacency than those of the public; and it requires a constant vigilance and energy to keep the practice of the Courts true to the principles on which they were established. This led to the revision of the system of emoluments which had grown up in the Supreme Court, by Parliament, some seven or eight years ago; when it was discovered that the Court had gradually allowed the fees of office to be so augmented in number and amount, that a single officer was actually in the enjoyment of emoluments, exceeding that of the three Secretaries of State in England!! Such is the natural tendency of all Courts; for abuses appear to grow up of their own accord, while reforms come in only through an arduous struggle. We have reason, however, to believe, that our contemporary has been misinformed in the present instance; and that one or two cases in which the privilege of liberation under the Act was contested, on the ground of unfair dealing, have been taken to represent the usual current of its proceedings. In those cases no blame can be attached, except to the Insurgent himself. If, however, it can be clearly proved, that the expense of passing through the ordeal of the Court has been raised from Three Hundred to a Thousand Rupees, a clear case will have been made out for examination. Happily, the remedy is at hand. The Legislative Council is vested with ample powers to make laws, which shall be binding on all Courts; on the Supreme Court, as well as on its satellites, the Insolvent Court; and these powers were granted with the express intention, that an Authority should exist on the spot, adequate to the correction of those abuses which creep insensibly into all institutions. A petition to the Council will cost no fees; and if the fact be established, it will interpose its supreme controlling authority between the officers of the Court, and the unhappy Insolvent. If the statement in the Harkurs be true, the benevolent agency of the Council cannot be exercised upon a more befitting object, than that of rescuing the poor Insolvent, after he has been obliged to resign all his possessions to the Court, from fresh demands which he has no means of meeting.

FLOATING BRIDGE AT CALCUTTA.—The community is much indebted to the Harkurs for drawing attention to the plan for the erection of a Floating Bridge across the Hooghly at Calcutta, similar to that over the Humoaze, from Devonport to Torpoint, in England. We trust our contemporary will continue to agitate the question, till he has succeeded in drawing a portion of the redundant capital of Calcutta to the completion of this important enterprise. We have given his article entire in another column.

From the data with which he has furnished us, it seems certain that the undertaking would more than pay; indeed, the only stipulation connected with it, appears to arise from the enormous return it would yield, on the outlay of capital. The expense of erecting two bridges,—and two at convenient distances are preferable to one,—would, it appears, not exceed one lakh of Rupees. The total annual charges are estimated at £691 7s. 6d. Let us take three, however, at 1000 Rupees a month, or £1200 in the year. The number of passengers daily crossing and recrossing the river, at the four ghats, or landing places, has been ascertained, from actual enquiry, to be not less than twenty thousand. Supposing each individual to pay only half a pice for each trip, the returns would, in three hundred and sixty-five days, amount to 56,940 Rupees; from which, if we deduct 12,000 Rupees for current charges, there will remain a dividend of 44,940 Rs. upon an outlay of one lakh, or nearly 45 per cent.!

But this is not all; experience teaches us that the creation of facilities for travelling, invariably increases the number of travellers, two, three and even four-fold. If a safe, cheap and expeditious mode of crossing the river be established, the number of passengers would, in a single twelvemonth, increase from twenty to thirty thousand. It is also to be expected that, with this facility, there would also grow up a desire to remove from the densely crowded streets and lanes of Calcutta, to a more open and cheap locality across the water; and that the increase of dwellings would exceed our most sanguine expectations. It would prove highly beneficial to the salubrity of Calcutta, if, from the establishment of a free communication on the river, a portion of the town could be transported across the water. It should also be observed, that many who are obliged now to live in the distant suburbs of Calcutta, and to trudge five miles daily to the scene of their labours, and five miles back again in the evening, would, without hesitation, remove their residences to the opposite side of the river, on the erection of a Floating Bridge, and thus save themselves a daily walk of five or six miles.

Neither is this all. Mr. Randal, the inventor of the Floating Bridge over the Humoaze states, that he had seen at one time in it three carriages with four horses, one carriage with a pair of horses, seven saddle horses and sixty foot passengers. The bridge will, therefore, be available for carriages, as well for passengers. Is it possible to calculate the benefits which would accrue from such an arrangement, and the impetus it would give to that large portion of the commerce of the country, which is transported by hand! The whole trade of the country which is now conducted on the great Benares road;—and since the construction of Lord William Bentinck's new road, it has immeasurably increased.—after traversing five hundred miles, stops short of the metropolis. It is wrought up by a broad river, and the goods are sent across into the town with much risk by boats. This is an evil of the most serious character. By the construction of such a Floating Bridge as the Harkurs recommends, loaded carriages, with cattle yoked to the m, would be at once transported to Calcutta, and the terminus of the great Benares road would be brought into the heart of the city, to the incalculable convenience of the Native merchants, and the no small benefit of the Floating Bridge Company.

If these data are sound; and if no Company can be formed to take up the plan of "establishing facilities of communication between both sides of the River," we think it the bounden duty of Government to enter upon the undertaking, not only as a matter of profit, but upon the still higher grounds of public humanity. It has been calculated that at the very lowest computation, one hundred and fifty lives are annually lost in the act of crossing and recrossing the river. This fearful destruction would be avoided by the establishment of a more secure mode of conveyance. When the ferries were placed under the management of the public officers of this State, twenty years ago, it was expressly stipulated, that "if in any case there should remain a clear surplus profit, after providing adequately for those purposes, the amount collected should be applied solely to the furtherance of similar objects, such as the repair or construction of roads, bridges and drains." It is well known that the ferries yield an annual profit to Government. It is even whispered that the surplus at the credit of the Ferry Funda at this time, amounts to several lakhs of Rupees. If this be the case, to what object of more obvious utility could it be applied, than to that of establishing Floating Bridges across the river at Calcutta, and thus of preventing so deplorable a loss of life annually; and to the completion of the Benares road, by connecting it with the city of Calcutta?

THE INDIAN ARMY.—Government has found it necessary to make a second augmentation of the Native army, by adding another company to each corps. This gives us an addition of seven thousand four hundred sepoy in the seventy-four Infantry Regiments. The previous augmentation of twenty men to a company, raised the number of troops by more than twelve thousand. The increase in both cases, therefore, does not fall far short of twenty thousand. It is among the inscrutable mysteries of Leadenhall Street, that with a perfect conviction that the real strength and efficiency of our Native army consists in its European Officers, and that without them, the troops are little better than a Native rabble, there should be so glaring a disproportion between officers and men, at a time when our army requires to be placed upon the most efficient footing. No plan could be devised for more effectually weakening our military power, than this unwise disregard of European Officers. As the army stood before the augmentation, there was an undue deficiency. The seventy-four Regiments of Bengal Infantry comprised, more or less, forty-seven thousand, three hundred, and sixty sepoy, which were officered nominally by fourteen hundred and eighty officers, or one officer to thirty-eight sepoy. On turning to the Directory, however, we find that no fewer than six hundred and fourteen officers were absent from their corps, at the beginning of this year, either on furlough or on staff appointments. This reduced the actual strength of the army to the proportion of one European Officer to sixty-six rank and file. But as the number of sepoy has since been augmented, without any corresponding increase of officers, the disproportion is become more glaring and disastrous. Supposing the number of officers absent on furlough, and on staff appointments at this present time, to be much the same as it was at the beginning of the year, the proportion of officers with their corps, compared with the number of sepoy, is within a fraction of one to ninety. How it is possible to keep up the efficiency of the Native army, under so miserable and pernicious a system, it is difficult to conceive. Here is a real grievance; here is a great political error. Here is a system pursued, which for the sake of saving a few thousand pounds a year, puts the whole empire in jeopardy. The subject is one which scarcely comes within the circle of those duties to which we limit ourselves; but as we have had occasion lately to defend the wisdom of Lord William Bentinck, in putting the army on a peace establishment, during a time of profound peace, we are compelled to follow up the subject, by pointing out the folly of raising the number of men to the full complement of a war establishment, and keeping the officers, the very soul and stay of the army, on a reduced scale, fit only for a time of peace. We have, to all appearance, come safely through the expedition beyond the Indus; but we are not free from internal insurrection, and our eastern frontier is menaced by two hostile powers; and peace in Europe is precarious. In these circumstances, it seems an act of gratuitous folly in the Directors, after having incurred the large expense of adding twenty thousand men to the Native army, to withhold, from a cheer-paring economy, the means of making those recruits efficient in the day of trial, by denying them the full complement of European Officers.

REDUCTION IN THE RATES OF POSTAGE.—We have now to record an act of the highest liberality, on the part of Government, in a still farther reduction of the rates of postage. We have given the new schedules in another portion of our paper, from which the reader will perceive, that letters of light weight may now be sent to a distance of one hundred miles for two pice, or one penny; to a distance of two hundred miles for one anna; and that the highest charge for letters of this lower weight sent to any part of India, is not to exceed eight annas, a shilling. This is a substantial boon, for which Government will receive a shower of blessings from the European, but more especially from the Native, community. So far from being a loser by this act of liberality, we are confident that Government will realize an increased income, at the same time that the public convenience is promoted to no ordinary degree. But it is not on the ordinary principles of gain, that the arrangements of the Post Office in India ought to be regulated. In a country so far advanced as England, it was only the activity of trade that shewed an impropriety in making the Post Office a source of revenue; in a country so backward as this, the Post must be considered as a great instrument of civilization. Every arrangement which facilitates and increases the internal communication of the various divisions of the country, gives at the same time a great impulse to national improvement; while at the same time it promotes those affectionate sympathies which serve to humanize society. If these results can be attained, without an encroachment on public funds, by the contributions of the people themselves, it must be considered as a happy circumstance. If, in addition to this, the same agency, by which civilization and the social affections are promoted, furnishes the means of transporting the despatches of Government, without any charge to the State, the advantage becomes still more conspicuous. It will be time enough, half a century hence, when we have filled the country with knowledge, and the seeds of improvement begin to germinate, to make the correspondence of the country an object of taxation. Till that period arrives, it is the duty of Government, as the renovators of India, to make the Post exclusively subservient to the higher objects of its civilization, and to increase from time to time the facilities of intercommunication, by reducing the rates of postage to that limit which shall save the public exchequer from loss.

EDUCATION IN THE WESTERN PROVINCES.—Since the system of the Committee of Public Instruction has proved a failure in the Western Provinces, and the Committee have expressed their determination to do nothing for rectifying the evil, but, on the contrary, to leave the millions of Upper India in their ignorance, it has been suggested in Gleanings of the Agra Journal, that Native Education in the Agra Presidency should be transferred from the hands of the Committee, to a Local Board, with a due proportion of the public funds appropriated to Native Education. The suggestion is highly worthy of consideration; and we trust it will not be lost sight of. There can be no reason why the Agra Presidency should not have its own educational economy administered within itself, as much as Bombay or Madras. Its people are as diverse in language and social condition from those of Bengal, and consequently, as much in need of special modifications of any gomental plan of education, as are the inhabitants of the other Presidencies. And the distances from Calcutta is so great as to make any direction here inefficient, however judicious it might be.

After the experience we have had in Calcutta of the working of a Committee of Public Instruction, formed of gentlemen of many minds and little leisure, it seems anything but desirable to appoint another body of the same kind at Agra. It may be assumed, that it would be still more difficult to find suitable persons for such a charge in the limited society there, than in the Metropolis. And though it were not, it is time to try whether an Official Superintendent of public education, under the immediate direction of the local government, would not be more effective than a Committee. The expense need not cause any alarm; for the Superintendent ought to be his own Secretary; and his salary, therefore, would merely be that of a Secretary, enhanced according to the rank it was thought desirable he should sustain. Every thing would depend upon the choice that was made for the new office. The gentleman selected ought to be a genuine scholar, perfectly familiar with the Hindoo and Oordoo, conversant with both the literature and the science of Europe, and known as a man of benevolent mind, deeply interested in Native education and general improvement.

Perhaps in any measure of this sort it might be taken as a settled point, that no part of the scanty funds appropriated to Native education should be devoted to any new institution for teaching either Samskrit or Arabic. India wants the substance of knowledge, and not the learned tongues by which ignorance has been consecrated and perpetuated. In winning the regard of the people to our instructions, we believe it a fallacy to consider the conciliation of the priesthood of paramount importance. Palpable utility will be far more effectual, than priestly recommendation, in filling our schools. Let us not disdain to educate our scholars for the employments to which they are naturally destined, and they will not refuse to imbibe at the same time the more pure and elevating instruction we desire to communicate. With utility, entertainment may be easily combined; and no school will fail in which the combination is judiciously made. On such a plan of instruction the vernaculars will be introduced for substantial use, and not merely to give colour to the assertion that they are not neglected.

action was brought in the Court of Requests, on the 21st, against Lieut. Marriott, for the wedding dress of his wife, Miss Leslie. He denied his responsibility, and asserted that her father's estate was liable for the debt. The Commissioner, Mr. McLeod, however, on being called in, decreed that a husband was responsible for all the debts due on account of his wife, up to the day of her marriage; a most comfortable doctrine.—A ship of 370 tons built at Hovrah, was put up for sale on the 26th, and knocked down for the sum of sixty thousand Rupees.

The name of the Jaloun Legion, the new corps about to be raised, is to be changed to that of Sandikhead Legion, and it is to consist of a thousand privates.—The latest accounts from England state, that the steamers intended for this country, are in a state of great forwardness. The Queen was launched on the 1st of June; the Cleopatra, a little before; and the Sesostris, a little after.—At the last meeting of the Bombay Branch Adamic Society, Dr. Stevenson read some observations on the Mahara language, in which he stated that about one-fifth of that language was not derived from Samskrit, or Arabic, or Persian, but belonged, he supposed, to some original language. How much it is to be desired that we could obtain a list of these words, with their meanings, in order to ascertain whether those words are to be found in any of the other languages of Northern India.—It is stated that Lord Auckland has ordered a commission to examine into the mode in which the duties have been performed at Simlah, by Colonel Tapp; and at Munrooie, by Colonel Young. The investigation at Simlah will be conducted by Mr. G. P. Thomson, and at the latter place, by Mr. Bouderson.—Letters from Simlah state, that Lord Auckland would positively leave Simlah as soon after the 1st of November as possible, and reach direct to Agra, which he expected to reach about the 5th of December.—Intelligence has been received that Col. Wade, decorated by the Shikhs, has, with four companies of Native Infantry, together with two guns, obtained possession of the Khyber Pass, after exchanging a few shots with the Khyberites. The fort which was evacuated, is represented as a tremendously strong place, which, if properly defended, could not have been taken by the whole of Sir John Keane's force.—The Agra Ukbar throws out a hint that Sir Hugh Gough, who distinguished himself with the 87th in the late war, will be appointed to the command of the Burmese expedition, if there is one.—The election of a Director for the Bank of Bengal was warmly contested between Mr. Nateson and Mr. C. Lyall; the former having 145 votes; the latter, 110.—The Rev. Mr. Smith, of the Scotch Mission, arrived in Calcutta, on Saturday last, with Anand Chunder Majeedee, who proceeded to Scotland some years ago with the Rev. Dr. Duff.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 24.

The Report of the Bombay Engineer, on the Hoosingabad Coal, appears in the papers of this day. It is highly favourable. The Coal is sixteen per cent. superior to English coal; the only difficulty is how to transport it from the valley of the Nerbada to Bombay.—We are happy to learn that Mr. Wilkinson intends to continue that most useful publication, Balfour's External Commerce of Bengal, and that the next volume is nearly ready for the Press.—The liberality of Government has been again exhibited, by a large reduction of postage. We refer our readers to the tables which will be found in another column.—Sir James Carnoo, it is said, has determined to re-examine the case of the Rajah of Satara, and to see justice done. The Bombay Durpas exults in this determination, on the ground that the previous examination was not impartial.

MONDAY, AUGUST 26.

It is said that the usurper, Mann Singh, has taken flight and pretended to make his submission to the Governor General, but it is supposed that his object is only to waste the time for military operations; and his frequent deceitful professions, leave little room to hope that there is any sincerity in his advances.—Before the army left Candahar, the Shah received a paper, containing the submission of twenty-six chiefs of Cabul, so that there is little or no chance of any opposition on the approach of the British army.—The Chamber of Commerce has addressed a letter to the Honourable the President in Council, in reference to the recent measure of the Bombay Government, in putting

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 22.

The Lord Bishop of Calcutta will commence his Triennial Visitation on the 16th of October next. His Lordship's travels will extend to February, 1841. The date of his probable arrival at the various stations was published in yesterday's Gazette.—Yesterday a sale was effected at Messrs. Jenkins, Low and Co., of a new description of Public Stock, called Opium Scrip. It is nothing more or less than Capt. Elliot's receipts for the Opium delivered up to him on behalf of Her Majesty's Government; and which it is supposed they will cheerfully pay; though we suspect the Ministry will look rather blank when Messrs. Jardine, Matheson and Co., present their little bill for Seven Hundred Thousand Pound Sterling. The Scrip opened at 180 Rs. the sheet, but when the bidders grew animated, the sheet rose to 365 Rs. The Auction Room was filled with speculators. The object evidently is to obtain a character for this stock, which may encourage speculation.—The Englishman announces that Sir Charles Metcalfe has been appointed Governor of Jamaica, in succession to Sir Lionel Smith, both old Indians; the one of twenty; the other, of nearly forty years standing.—It is announced that Sir Henry Fane has received the formal permission of Lord Elgin to resign the command of the Indian army; and that His Excellency adheres to his intention of returning to England in November or December next.—An back the date for the despatch of the September Mail. With not less truth than justice they affirm, that in the arrangements made at that Presidency for the despatch of the Overland Mail, the authorities have in almost every instance little studied, if not recklessly disregarded, the convenience of the other Presidencies, and they pray that in this instance, instructions may be forwarded to Bombay, directing that the Mail be not despatched till the receipt of Calcutta letters of the 31st instant. His Honour, however, while he sympathizes in the regret that the date originally fixed upon was not adhered to, declines to authorize any new arrangement.—Bengal Bank Shares which were very recently sold at a premium of 2,000 Rupees, have rather suddenly risen to 2,500.—The Enterprise Steamer leaves Calcutta this morning, for Rangoon and Monmouth, and on her return will call at Madras.—Major General Hampton, who has been appointed to command the expedition against Joudhpore, has arrived at Nussersaid, to concert the plan of the campaign with Colonel Sutherland. That station will be the point of assembly, and all the troops destined for this enterprise are ordered to concentrate thither.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 27.

It appears that the approval of the Court of Directors of the arrangements first proposed for the distribution of the shares of the Chartered Bank of Bombay, which were upset by the Government of India, though so confidently announced, has not arrived at that Presidency by the last Mail.—Letters have been received from the ARMY OF THE INDUS, dated the 10th July, a few marches beyond Khelat-i-Ghilzie. There was no longer any prospect of the smallest opposition. The country submitted as the army advanced; the people were bringing provisions rapidly, and Ootah was down at sixteen seers the Rupee. Water was plentiful and good.—A long, but very temperate and loud letter from Mr. Samuels, the Magistrate of Hooghly, appears in this morning's Herkara, in which he triumphantly refutes the charge of unfairness in the trial of the pretender to the Burdwan Raj, which have been so frequently paraded, of late, in the newspapers.—This is a busy day for meetings within the District. The District Charitable Society meets at nine; the Calcutta Docking Company at noon; the Mechanics' Institute at seven in the evening; and Valadars and the Ryekmanns give a concert at eight.—Mr. Hodgson, the Resident at Cateandou, in a letter to a gentleman at Agra, speaks very decidedly of the hostile feelings of the Nepalese, and of their determination to commence an attack on us as soon as the Tarrare is possible.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 28.

The Secretaryship of both the Union and the Agra Bank have become simultaneously vacant. Col. Young has resigned his post in the former, in order to resume his sitting appointment in the Law Commission. Mr. Gordon has resigned his situation in the Agra Bank. He and Mr. T. Bruckan are candidates for the Union Bank.—Letters have been received from the ARMY OF THE INDUS, dated the 30th of July. The Army had reached Ghiani, and Col. Wade had arrived at Jelalabad. Dost Mahomed Khan has fled, with a few followers, to Balk. Other accounts state, that Lord Auckland had received letters from Rajah Kurruck Singh, stating that Cabul was actually in possession of the British troops.—At the meeting of the Calcutta Docking Association, held yesterday, it was stated that the profits of the concern amounted, during the past half year, to eight per cent. per annum.—A calculation, embracing every Indigo Factory under this Presidency, is published in this day's Herkara, in which the probable out-turn of such is put down, and the result of the whole season is calculated at a lakh and twenty thousand mounds.—It is affirmed in the papers, that a Brigade of Infantry, with a European Regiment, and a troop of Horse Artillery, are to remain at Cabul, of course with the Shah's Contingent. The Bombay troops are to return through Lower Belinda to Bombay, settling accounts by the way with the Beloches Chief of Khelat.—The office of Police Surgeon, vacated by the death of Dr. Bala, is warmly contested among the medical staff of the Metropolis. The patronage is vested in the Governor General. We learn that Dr. W. O'Shaughnessy has been appointed to act ad interim, till His Lordship's pleasure is known.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE INDUS.

The following extract of a letter from a gentleman who lately proceeded from Ferozepore to Sukkur via water, will be interesting to our readers. This route, it requires little sagacity to foresee, will ere long become one of immense importance and recourse in this part of India. Our letter is dated Sukkur, 29th July:—

Left Ferozepore on the 18th instant, reached Shewalpur on the 23rd, and if it had not been for strong Westerly winds occasionally met with, might have been here a couple of days earlier.

However it has been the quickest passage made hitherto, for Mr. Ross Bell's party were 11½ days on the trip. A little rain soon after quitting Ferozepore, soon afterwards, so that it was oppressive during the day, the thermometer averaging 92, Minimum 80, Maximum 102, except when at Bhawalpore—when the range was—at 5 A. M. 80, 9 A. M. 98, 12 noon 100, 3 P. M. 107, 10 P. M. 100, and at 100 it stood all night. This gives a pretty fair conclusion as to what a person must expect to meet with in the way of temperature on the Indus at this time of the year, provided there be no rain. The river is even larger than was expected. In some parts of the Indus the opposite banks could not be seen. The jungle on either bank is now every way overflown, and one day no dry ground could be got for the servants to cook on. The currents and eddies in some places were very strong, and set the boats with their vane a working in fine style. But when they approached and passed round the Fort of Sukkur, the current of the river was tremendous, so that it was thought the boat would be swamped. The river is here confined to a comparatively narrow limit, and the banks are high and rocky on both sides. Mr. Bell—his assistants—Lieutenant Langdon of the Engineers, and the Doctor are perched up together in a small close-fortified Native building on the verge of the river, to which a room or two of lat and plaster have been added, and in addition to this their tents are pitched close at hand, so that they are not so badly off after all.—Agra Utkar.

THE FLOATING BRIDGE.

Many of our readers will doubtless be gratified to learn, that our proposal of a floating bridge over the Hooghly, about Hornrah, similar to that over the Hannouse, from Devonport, to Torpol, has attracted the notice of some of the scientific men of this community, and that some enquiries have been made on the subject of its practicability, which seem favorable to the undertaking. One scientific friend has kindly favoured us with the 2d volume of the transactions of the Institution of Civil Engineers, in which there is a very full description, with several plates illustrative of this invention, which has answered so admirably. We cannot consistently get the several plates engraved for our paper, and fully to understand the description without them, would be difficult. We may, however, with advantage, advert to some points of the description, in addition to those given in a former number, that are important to a right conclusion on the practicability of introducing a floating bridge of the kind over the Hooghly.

The great question of course is, will it pay; though if that were doubtful, we think, on the score of humanity alone, such an improvement would be worthy of the support of the Government. If, however, it can be made easier, that the floating bridge will pay, then of course private enterprise may undertake it. Some returns have already been obtained that may serve to determine this point; but a great deal more information is yet required. We have seen an estimate which made the profit 80,000 rupees a year, and it has been suggested that the Steam Tug Association might venture on the undertaking.

Over the Hannouse there are two of the bridges referred to; the cost of the first was £3,322; that of the second, £9,816; the cost of the landing places, shafts and balance weights, £1,530; engineering and law expenses, £1,000; making the whole expenditure about £5,668, as we collect from the description now before us.

The total yearly charges are estimated at £281 7s. and 6d., or rather about £280 a month, including the cost of engines, sails, usual and incidental repairs, and every thing in short, except interest on the capital, which, we observe, does not form an element in the calculation.

The income of the Hannouse ferry, when first opened, was £280. At the end of four years, it was let at £2,000 a year, over and above the cost of collecting—that is, in that period, the tolls had more than doubled, and there can be little doubt, that the same effect would follow a similar case here.

The following is one of the returns obtained here, to which we have above alluded:—

Statement of passengers that departed from and came to Golahbarree Ghaut in ferry boats, on the 25th May, 1889, from 4 in the morning till 11 at night.

From Calcutta to Rankineepore ditto, .....	2,300

Statement of passengers that departed from and came to Sulkeah in ferry boats on the 4th June, 1889, from 4 in the morning till eleven at night.

From Sulkeah to Calcutta Ghaut, .....	3,100
From Calcutta to Sulkeah, .....	3,000

(Signed) W. J. GOODRALL, River Police Constable.

Sulkeah Ghaut is often confounded with Howrah Ghaut; but they are distinct places, and we suppose Constable Goodsell is aware of this, for we find a separate return of his quoted in the letter before us, of the passengers that passed to and fro from Howrah Ghaut on the 24th May, according to which the number was 7,700.

Now we incline to think, that if such a ferry were provided, all those who now cross at the various ferries above named, would walk a mile or two to take advantage of it. Most assuredly they would, if they could go for the same price with safety and comfort, for which they now go in danger and discomfort. Again, if, as we believe to be the case, all these ferries are monopolies formed out by Government, of course it would be in the power of the state to abolish the other ferries, in favour of the new and safe one, giving those who undertook to establish and carry on that, a monopoly for a certain time. We beg to observe, that we are not advocating the introduction of monopolies, to which we are by no means favourable; but if monopolies are to be continued, it is better to give one monopoly of a ferry, that possesses the advantage of safety, comfort and regularity, than half a dozen that have none of these advantages, but yearly cause the deaths of many of the natives. If we are right, then, we think, the charge might fairly be, to each poor native taking his chance on the "roadways or docks," one pie, instead of half a pie, supposed to be the present charge of crossing. The number crossing at Howrah in one day, has been ascertained to be 778, which is perhaps about the average. The total crossing at the three other Ghauts reported in the return above quoted, is 19,649; including Howrah, then, the grand total is 20,349, which at  $\frac{1}{2}$  of an anna each, would yield Rs. 817-15 per diem.

We do not, however, reckon on the payments of poor native passengers as the sole or even the chief source of reimbursement. We look to the charges on many comparatively wealthy passengers, who would be induced with such means to cross—many who now go in expensive bhauleas (as the floating bridge is fitted with a cable), and to the freight of horses, carriages, and hackneys. From all these sources, we have no manner of doubt, that a very large and profitable return on the capital invested, would be made, and we have seen, that the whole outlay required, falls short of a lakh of a Rupee. We do trust, then, that the Steam Tug Association will not consider this undertaking unworthy of their enquiries at least; and we are disposed to think, that the more they enquire into the subject, the more they will find themselves disposed to embark in the speculation. If they do not, we must express our confident expectation that the Government will.

"As a criterion," says Mr. Read, the inventor of the bridge over Hemoose, "of the capabilities for accommodation (of the floating bridge) I would state that I have seen it at one time, three carriages, each with four horses, one carriage with a pair of horses, seven mulla horses and 80 foot passengers, and still there was nothing like crowding or discomfort, though the exposure of the site is such, that the sea often breaks over the funnel of the engine."

Again, the bridge crosses the river four times an hour, viz. it leaves the landing place on the east side at half hours, and the landing place on the west side at the intervening quarters. The time of crossing, as before stated, is on an average of high and low water,  $\frac{7}{8}$  minutes, making up the quarter of an hour.

We might quote other particulars, but we have already repeated some portion of the details given in the description quoted from the Repository of Arts; and enough has been said on that, and on the present occasion, to show the advantages of the improvement recommended. Of one which would actually result from it, we have said nothing, though it is by no means unimportant to many, we mean the great increase it would cause in the value of landed property on the other side of the river; but there is another immense advantage that would be derived from this improvement, which we must not neglect to mention; we mean the impetus it would give, in connection with a bridge over Balloo-kol, (being since proposed) to the trade that goes by the great Burdwan road.

We hope soon to obtain some further information as to what is doing in this matter, when we shall return to the subject. As a move has been made in it, we hope yet to see the object attained.—Markara, August 28.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Before proceeding to the business of the day, Dr. Cook and Dr. Chalmers placed on the table of the Assembly the motions which they meant to submit to the house on Wednesday, the day on which the Auchenarder case is to come on.

DR. COOK'S MOTION.

In the year 1834 the General Assembly passed an Interim act on call, whereby it was enacted and ordained,—“That it shall be an instruction to Presbyteries, that if, at the moderating in a call to a vacant pastoral charge, the major part of the male heads of families, members of the vacant congregation, and in full communion with the church, shall disapprove of the person in whose favour the call is proposed to be moderated in, such disapproval shall be judged sufficient ground for the Presbytery rejecting such person, and that he shall be rejected accordingly, due notice thereof being forthwith given to all concerned.” The church and parish of Auchenarder having become vacant in August, 1834, on the 16th of September thereafter the Earl of Kinnoul, as patron, issued a presentation to the said church and parish in favour of the Rev. Robert Young, preacher of the Gospel. The presentation having been sustained by the Presbytery, an opportunity was afforded, in terms of the aforesaid act and its regulations, to the male heads of families to give dissent from the call and settlement of Mr. Young as minister of the parish; and in consequence of dissents having been tendered by a majority of the male heads of families, Mr. Young was afterwards rejected as presentee to the said church and parish of Auchenarder.

Thereupon the Earl of Kinnoul and Mr. Young instituted, in the Court of Session, a process of Auchenarder against the Presbytery of Auchenarder, concluding, inter alia, that it should be found and declared that the rejection of Mr. Young as presentee was ultra vires of the Presbytery, in violation of the statute libellated on, and to the serious injury of their patrimonial rights as patron and presentee.

The Presbytery of Auchenarder having transmitted the summons executed against them to the Consistory of the General Assembly, which met in November, 1835, and the Commission having heard a statement from the Commissioners of the Presbytery of Auchenarder, were, as the record bears, unanimously of opinion “that this is an action which ought to be defended, and therefore recommended to the General Assembly to authorise the procurator to conduct the defence at the expense of the church, and, in the meantime, approve of the offer of the procurator to take charge of the cause in the name of the presbytery of Auchterarder, so far as may be necessary, before the meeting of the next General Assembly."

The process having been defended, accordingly, by the Presbytery of Auchterarder, under the sanction and at the expense of the General Assembly, the following Judgment was pronounced by the Court of Session:—"Edinburgh, 8th March, 1839.—The Lords of the First Division having considered the appeal for the Earl of Kinnoul and the Rev. Robert Young, and for the Presbytery of Auchterarder, and additional plea in defence admitted to the record, and having heard counsel for the said parties at great length, in presence of the Judges of the Second Division and Lords Ordinary, and having heard the opinions of the said Judges, they, in terms of the opinions of the majority of the Judges, reject the objections to the jurisdiction of the Court, and to the competency of the action as directed against the Presbytery. Further, reject the plea in defence of acquiescence. Find, that the Earl of Kinnoul has legally, validly, and effectually exercised his right, as patron of the church and parish of Auchterarder, by presenting the pursuers, the said Robert Young, to the said church and parish: find, that the defenders, the Presbytery of Auchterarder, did refuse, and continue to refuse, to take trial of the qualifications of the said Robert Young, and have rejected him as presenter to the said church and parish on the sole ground—as they admit on the record—that a majority of the male heads of families, communicants in the said parish, have dissented, and, in serious and legal manner, from his appointment as minister: find, that the said Presbytery, in so doing, have acted to the hurt and prejudice of the said pursuers illegally, and in violation of their duty, and contrary to the provisions of certain statutes libelled on; and, in particular, contrary to the provisions of the statute 16th Anne, chap. 12, entitled, 'An Act to restore patron to their ancient rights of presenting ministers to the churches and parishes of Great Britain called Scotland' is so far as to compel the defenders to take the said Presbytery, and decrees and orders accordingly; and allow the above decree to go out, and be executed as an interim decree, and with these findings and declarations remit the process to the Lord Ordinary, to proceed further therein as he shall see just.

(Signed) "G. Horn, L. P. D."

In terms of the authority given by the General Assembly to the Procurator for the Church, on the 24th May, 1836, to appeal the judgement of the Court of Session, so soon as he, and the other counsel for the Presbytery in the said cause, shall think fit, an appeal was entered to the House of Lords, by whom the following judgement has been pronounced:—3rd May, 1839: "It is ordered and adjudged by the lords spiritual and temporal, in Parliament assembled, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutor therein complained of be, and the same be, hereby affirmed."

Under these circumstances it is moved, "That the act on call, solemnly denominated the Veto Act, having been thus declared by the supreme civil tribunals of the country to infringe on civil and patrimonial rights, with which the church has often and expressly required that its judicatures should not intermeddle, as being matters incompetent to them, and not within their jurisdiction, it be an instruction by the General Assembly to all presbyteries, that they proceed, hereafter, in the settlement of parishes according to the practice which prevailed previously to the passing of that act; keeping specially in view the undoubted privilege of parishioners to state, at the moderation in the call, any relevant objections to the induction of presentees; upon which Presbyteries, after hearing parties, shall decide, it being in the power of these parties to appeal, if they see cause, to the superior or church courts."

DR. CHALMERS'S MOTION.

The General Assembly having heard the report of the Procurator on the Auchterarder case, and considered the judgement of the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Session, and being satisfied that, by the said judgement, all questions of civil right, so far as the Presbytery of Auchterarder is concerned, are substantially decided, do now, in accordance with the uniform practice of this Church, and with the resolution of last General Assembly ever to give and inculcate implicit obedience to the decisions of civil courts in regard to the civil rights and emolument, secured by law to the church, instruct the said Presbytery to suffer no further resistance to the claims of Mr. Young or of the patrons to the emoluments of the benefices of Auchterarder, and to refrain from claiming the jus decanatus, or any other civil right or privilege connected with the said benefice.

And whereas the principle of non-interference is one coeval with the reformed Kirk of Scotland, and forms an integral part of its constitution, embodied in its standards, and declared in various acts of assembly, the General Assembly resolve that this principle cannot be abandoned, and that no presbyter shall be forced upon any parish contrary to the will of the congregation.

And whereas by the decision above referred to, it appears that when this principle is carried into effect, in any parish, the legal provision for the sustentation of the ministry in that parish may be thereby suspended, the General Assembly being deeply impressed with the unhappy consequences which must arise from any collision between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, and holding it to be their duty to use every means in their power, not involving dereliction of the principles and fundamental laws of their constitution, to prevent such unfortunate results, do therefore appoint a committee for the purpose of considering in what way the privileges of the National Establishment and the harmony between church and state may remain unimpaired, with instructions to confer with the Government of the country if they see cause.—Pat.

Wednesday, May 29.

As was anticipated, the Assembly was crowded long before the business commenced, and such was the anxiety manifested, that throughout the day crowds lingered about the doors to the persevering desire to gain admittance.

The Clerk read the Procurator's report as to the Auchterarder case.

Dr. Cook then rose amidst the most profound silence, and said,—Moderator, I need not say one single word upon the infinite importance of the discussion of the question for the consideration of which we are now met. We have now, Sir, in calling on my reverend friend to inaugurate the blessing of almighty God on our deliberations, testified how deeply we are impressed with the solemn importance of the occasion. In former days it was competent to consider whether our proceedings aimed the veto act were in conformity with the civil laws or not, and accordingly a great part of our reasoning turned on that point, some arguing that it was consistent with the laws of the land to pass that act, and others entertaining a different feeling. That view of the subject is now, however, at an end,—in as far as it can be regarded as a civil question it is decided. You have heard that the judgement of the Supreme Court of this country has been affirmed by that of the House of Peers,—and therefore as to the civil authority and the civil interpretation there now can exist no doubt. I presume that there is a little doubt that the statutes of our Church and our Books of Discipline draw a clear, and marked, and distinct line between ecclesiastical and civil jurisdiction. There is a decided difference pointed out, and we are positively enjoined not to enter within the sphere of civil jurisdiction. In the second Book of Discipline, the deliberative production of men who would be acknowledged to be perfectly free from any taint of Erastianism, it is said (the Rev. Doctor read from the authorities), that only ecclesiastical things shall be handled by them, and that there should be no meddling with anything pertaining to the civil power, to which the Church and its members are not to be in all civil matters; and that the Assembly should take heed that the civil authority be not confounded with the ecclesiastical. In our Confession of Faith it is also laid down, that Synods and Councils are to handle nothing, and to include nothing but which is ecclesiastical; and that we are not at all to interfere with the temporal affairs of the country, except by way of humble petition in extraordinary cases, and that general principle is clearly brought out. And here is the position in which we stand, or rather we are driven to the question,—there is this act on call, declared by the Supreme Courts of the land to be as infringing on civil or patrimonial rights,—we have declared that we are not to interfere with these rights,—and the line of conduct resulting from those two propositions appears to be abundantly clear. I know no way of escaping from this position but by resorting to our ancient policy, well known in other years, viz.,—that we are bound not to interfere with civil matters; but the question has been raised, that it belongs to us, the Church, to declare what is civil and what is not,—that we have a co-ordinate power with the civil judicatures to decide this vital question, and that until we put our imprimatur on the proceeding of these civil courts, to the effect that we consider the government of the Church, with which we cannot interfere,—that until we do this, their decrees or decisions are to receive no regard from the Church courts; for such is the result of that argument. (Hear, hear.) But I cannot think much weight can be rested on this view of the question, although it is, in some degree, involved in the motion of my ray, and much valued friend opposite (Dr. Chalmers). How does an Established Church regard this government? I must get it,—it is constituted by the law of the land,—we are taken out of the ordinary classes of Christians, and by particular statutes are conferred on us all the civil privileges and all the power that we possess. And I ask, is there any statute that gives to the Establishment a power like this? Is there any Act of Parliament that invests us with this power? I have never seen such an Act, and no other man ever did. It appears, therefore, that in this point of view there is no authority whatever. But there is a contradiction in the very idea,—we not only have it not, but we cannot have it, consistent with the great end of civil government. There cannot be two independent Legislatures in one country,—society could not exist in any land if the Legislature or governing power were not supreme.—If you once admitted an impetus in imperio, it would have been tearing up not only the foundations of all government, but the foundation on which the social structure must rest. I hold, therefore, that there is no warrant for this doctrine. But this is not merely a matter of theory; there has been much use often made in the Christian world of what I said a little ago as to the power of the Church interfering with civil affairs. We all know we have historical proof in what they say remains to which I have alluded was actually advanced by the English Church. The authority of the sivil magistrate and the civil power, in so far as language admitted, was abundantly shown; a great reverence was expressed for the temporal powers, and if they sought into the earlier history of the English attempts to invade the sivil right of sovereignty, they would find no such intimation of resistance. But they were to apply mischievous, and draw analogies and metaphysical subtilties,—they argued that what was civil was to be derived under the category of a spiritual kind,—they endeavored to show by what the Legislature of the country said that they found some sort of connection between what was declared and their ecclesiastical power; and there is nothing in the form of law, but in the sense of some of them, it was to be discovered, but by assuming that there was such connection; they made the application of their power by saying, "Oh, this now comes under our power, and we alone are entitled to legislate on it." What gave rise to the numerous abuses of that Church, but the publication of those doctrines? What was the cause of its numberless corruptions,—those corrupting influences in the past,—the corruption of the crown of mankind, and in the end leading to that glorious Reformation, in consequence of which, so far as regards the Protestant lands, they were all swept away? Nothing could be fairer than the first part of my rev. friend, (Dr. Chalmers's) motion. (Read the first part, which fully requires the obedience to the civil authority.) If my rev. and excellent friend had stuck there for full authority of the civil power in matters purely temporal and extraneous as I am; but we must go on to the next paragraph. (Read subsequent part of Dr. Chalmers's motion.) Now I beg leave to say, what is the meaning of the principle here contended for? It must be that the intrusion is something in conformity, and to be regulated by the veto set; and while was founded by the same men who were the authors of the principle of non-resistance that the defenders, the Presbytery of Anchester had to refuse and continue to refuse to take trial of the qualifications of Mr. Young, the presbyter, and have rejected him, &c.; and that in doing so the Presbytery have acted "illegally and in violation of their duty, and contrary to the provisions of certain statutes introduced on me. I may say, that the doctrine taken from the scriptures and completely contradicted by the word or an expression, that means the only cause it can be taken to involved in this motion,—it is not true that this was embodied in the standards of the Church, or was even an integral part of its constitution, until 1844. No doubt it is laid in many of our standards, that a person shall not be intruded on a congregation; and we all know the sovereignty and the power of the word or an expression, that means things to the mind, and we come to use it in the clear meaning, although there may be perfect evidence that another and different meaning was formerly ascribed to it. Now, I do not rest on this assertion; I will go through the different periods to show that there is a mistake in my reverend friend's suggestion as to this principle. The removal of the Church from the various parts of the country, the establishment of ministers, and maintained that the sum of the doctrine of the Church as to extension was that the Presbytery had power to try every presbyter. He then went on to say, I am quite ready to do any thing that can be done for the good of the people of Scotland, provided I leave you from being placed in rebellion. Let no one imagine, from the words of Dr. Chalmers, that the reason of his receding from his position and action is not owing to this. (Symptoms of murmuring from the opposite side.) What I mean to say is just that I defy one and all of those gentlemen to rise and contradict me. What I am to say is, that Dr. Chalmers authorizes the declaration by the Church of that which the Supreme Civil Judiciary declares to be illegal, contrary to the duties of the Presbytery in question, and in violation of the rights of Dr. Chalmers that he is to lead on a band of robbers. Now, it appears to me to be quite clear that it is impossible that there can be an Established Church with the power assumed to it by Dr. Chalmers. Now, if we are not an Establishment, we cannot have the power of modifying the law,—we cannot have it as a private body of Christians. Now, with respect to that amount in,—just that extent of power, which is civil power, delinquent. We cannot have that power, otherwise we must dissolve the society or union at once. If my argument was good, just dissolve the society or union at once. If any gentleman has seen the act which is said to be unlearned the acts are in no law, it is altogether a nullity,—the Church has acted in error. The question then arises, and it is a momentous question,—What is the Church to do? Is it to resist the state? Or is it to fall in with the state? To submit to the state in which we were before that act was passed. We are just to take up the law in the state that it was, and to interpret it literally and not perversely, and to be guided by it just as if this law had not been passed. He then went on to consider what would be the consequences of Dr. Chalmers's motion, and that it would alienate the affections of the people and destroy all hope of the success of the cause. No doubt it would, if the understanding all the blessings of an Establishment, we would rather see them taken from us, and the endowments scattered to the winds,—that we would rather do that than submit to what we think to be wrong. As a general principle nothing can let me stand sound. But it is absolutely necessary to destroy the Establishment in order to adhere to the principle which we may think right? Those days are gone by; if any man finds that the constitution of the Establishment is such, that in consequence of its connection with the State, he is called to lend obedience in what he thinks an invasion by the majority of its spiritual privileges,—the way is perfectly clear, for will he not say that the Establishment is not to be allowed to carry all his views into effect? He will not only acquiesce, but happily the Government of the land will protect him in avowing and defending his religious opinions. Here, then, is the alternative for those who feel any of those scruples, and who wish to get rid of the Government, and at the same time to rid the Government of those endowments which we hope long to enjoy. (Laughter and cries of Hear, hear.) Those who are so situated are perfectly free to do as they please. But the laws of the Church, shall be respectively repealed, their incomes shall be abolished, Sir, I am very desirous that you should attend to the next point. Sir, I have been said,—and there are overtures now on the table, and I am afraid an implication of the same kind in the motion of my reverend and excellent friend,—viz. to this effect, let us not set ourselves in direct array against the civil power, but let us pass an act by which all presutes and ordained ministers who will acquiesce in the measures we consider,—the laws of the Church, shall be respectively repealed, their incomes shall be abolished, and the Church never took a measure more calculated to hurt it in the estimation of high-minded and honourable men, than when they took this resolution. It was decided covertly and secretly to do that which an honourable man would have imagined could only be done by a fair, open, direct resistance. You possess on the helpless victims instead of mentally struggling with the power of the law, and assisting the British people with the liberty of the conscience of the Government, what is it, and what will be to God it may ever be, if its subjects did not find a speedy and complete protection for doing no more than settling in obedience to the law. (Hear, hear.) It is also that we must go to the Legislature and endeavour to get our ecclesiastical policy so moulded as to involve no collision between Church and State. (Hear, hear.) Nothing could be more constitutional. It is perfectly plain, that according to the great principle of the law, if laws are held together, there must be subordination to the ruling power, and to plain words, they must obey the law; but there is also a sacred right, which all in this happy country possess, and that is, to go to the Legislature with their remonstrances, and get the laws remedied where they conceive the necessity exists. In that point of view I have no objection to this last proposition, but I have been always aware to the Church going to the Legislature to ask that the laws should be repealed, and that the Government should be referred to the ignorance of the constitution of the Scottish Church under which our senators laboured, and quoted the authority of Lord Moncreiff to show the danger of going to Parliament. He then proceeded. Now, Sir, it may happen, if we persist in the policy inferred by the opposite motion, we are in great danger not merely of shaking the foundations of the Establishment, but of doing so in such a manner as to render the Legislature will not interpose directly or immediately to say that we are acted in this manner, and that we will dissolve the Establishment; but we may apprehend something such as this, that when once entered on that field on which so many are wandering,—when once began to assume power, and prove that which is the desire of Suprema Judicature does not oblige us,—that we may go according to the downward tendency of all our dispositions,—that we may go on in such a manner as to increase our infidelity to a degree as will render an Establishment intolerable, and may ultimately work out its own destruction. But we may not be permitted thus gradually to be destroyed,—we may expect that the terms of the oathstep being broken, the Establishment is itself dissolved. We shall then have many Dissenters,—all the Irregulars part of the community pressing there in every possible way, and pressing on the Legislature, and the Government, and the Government will be forced to take measures to meet the demands of a revolution,—we have calmly decided, that if such is the revolution, and if language can be understood, that we adhere to the compact, and reprobate the policy which has led to this crisis. Deserted as we may be, and deserted, as I much dread we shall be if the policy now proposed be adopted, we still shall adhere to her,—we shall still cherish the same terms and temperance of mind, we shall still be true to the Government, and we shall support and countenance of the majority of the misguidance of our countrymen, we shall plant her once more in safety in the haven of tranquillity. (Loud cries of Hear, hear.)

The reverend doctor again rose, and added, that he was quite ready to append to his motion that all ministers presented to kirks be tried as to whether they are qualified for the places to which they are appointed, in addition to their ordinary trials. This was the amount of his motion, and if it was carried, it would be exceedingly necessary to prepare some sort of directory by which it might be fully carried out.

Dr. Chalmers said, it had been asserted that he appeared there as the representative of the opinions of a particular section of the house. He solemnly disclaimed the truth of the imputation. He had set himself down to the consideration of that question with a mind as free of all party bias and influence as ever he had set down to an abstract question,—to the study of any abstract question whether in theology or mathematics. The motion he had proposed out of his hands for a day or two. It was returned, but with one or two emendations, the same as before. He had given it out of his hands in consequence of his inability to put his views into a business shape. The motion was returned to him in the right shape, without any change in substance. It had come back with a more mild and conciliatory complexion than he, with all his endeavors, had been able to give it. (Hear.) He had to repeat the recommendation which he had made six years before, when the veto act was first proposed at a meeting of its supporters. The truth was, he had all along felt that up to that time it had been too much the habit to regard the question of right in the choice of a pastor, as one which lay entirely between patron and people; whereas, this view, by far the most important aspect, in his estimation, was the question as it lay between the patron and the Church. It was undoubtedly the right of the people to have a voice in the appointment of a pastor, and it was equally the right of the patron or landlord to make the appointment; and then, it was the province of the Church to give effect to it. When these did not harmonize, the contest was not so much between power and power as between power and principle. (Hear.) The patron, when he granted a presentation, in the exercise of his civil rights, should do it in a spirit of regard to the rights of the Church. Whether the patron looked to that or not, the Church was bound to its use. The patron was only bound to appoint a minister for the parish as best pleased him; but the Church was bound, by a powerful obligation, to see that its accomplishment in that and every other parish should at all times provide an efficient, healthy, and spiritual ministrations. If to the patron belonged, as his proper department, to single out the individual on whom he would bestow the presentation, it equally belonged to the Church to judge of the fitness of the presentee, and according to that judgment either to receive or reject him. That was carrying the doctrine of the Church's power a great deal further than many would go along with him,—the power of sitting in judgement on the moral and literary qualification of the presentee,—of sitting in judgement on all the circumstances by which the usefulness of the presentee was affected,—and of sitting in judgement on the character of the presentee. It was for the Christian's good of the families over whom he was to be placed, and the congregation to which he was to be appointed. He held that the Presbytery had full power, by the constitution of the Church, to judge of all these powers,—powers which had been completely swept away within the last three weeks. Much had been said of the civil rights of the patron, and no talk subject he advised that they should go to Parliament for a remedy, and so be saved from the unhappy collision which had taken place. But let it be distinctly understood, that when he advised that, he did not do it for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of the State in favour of the great principle of non-intrusion, for that he held beyond their province; not for the purpose of superseding the civil to the ecclesiastical sanction, in order to confer any other authority than was contained in the veto act, or any other device by which they were to carry the non-intrusion principle into effect,—for such he also held to be beyond their province; but for the purpose of making sure that they did not endanger that which was altogether within the power and province of the Government, either to give or withhold,—the inevitable benefits of a National Establishment of religion,—of making sure that they did not discover the temporariness from the Church, which would lead to consequences fraught with danger to the moral and religious interests of the people of Scotland. That was the only principle on which they could vindicate the step which he wished they had taken six years ago, and his only regret was that it had not. He only regretted that his efforts were overruled by the high legal authorities of those whom he believed to be much more competent than himself for forming a judgement on the statute which was now submitted to Parliament for a remedy, and that they were now resolved to adopt the course he had formerly recommended, in order to repair the evil that had been inflicted in consequence of the abandonment of his views. He perfectly agreed with his revered friend, that they had nothing to do with the nature of the veto act, or any other act; but that act was required to carry into precise and definite effect the principle of non-intrusion which he had held, that in consequence of such variance between the law of the Church and the law of the land, they could not adhere to that law. They had still in their power to adhere to that law, and to the principles of a National Establishment, by applying to Parliament for a sanction to the veto act, or some other measure to secure the principle of non-intrusion, which he now deeply regretted he had given up at a previous period. He thought it of importance to notice another subject, viz. the opinion that had gone abroad among the higher classes in Scotland and England in regard to what was termed the Radicalism of their proceedings. The Church had been called a radical and rebellious Church,—and it would be proper, in order to blunt the edge of these accusations, to inquire as to the origin of the law which had occasioned that abuse. It was matter of great satisfaction that the veto act came forth under the sanction of His Majesty's legal adviser. It was because it was a measure connected with the law of the land that the legal advisers of the Government were consulted. Every thing, therefore, that the champions of law founded on, lay at the door, not of the ecclesiastical, but of the civil members of the Assembly. (Hear, hear.) He was come to speak of what was to be done under the circumstances under which they were placed. They had been advised to make application to the Legislature, in order to obtain a civil sanction to the veto act, or something better. (Applause.) His rev. friend had adverted to the way in which the Church extension scheme was carried on, and to the present state of matters as injuring the Church in the country, but he would show that a more salutary remedy to the State would have a much more disastrous effect in destroying the moral vigour of the Church of Scotland. (Hear.) He felt no desire to accept of an endowment offered to him as a bribe of a criminal and disgraceful character. (Hear, and applause.) But he held that an application presented to the Legislature for its sanction to the law formerly passed by them was no mean submission,—could he mean without a tinge of Erastianism, and without a sacrifice of one lota of principle. Dr. Chalmers went on to declare his intention of being away from the resolution of maintaining the independence of the Church in spiritual matters, by the consideration of endowments, and he would disclaim all sympathy with those who would look on the Church alone as in the Temple Court, and who looked on the Established Church as a mere engine, forming part of the patron's ministerial treasury of the State. They solemnly believed the Church of Scotland to have a far loftier character, derived from its operation on the population of the country, and could not look on it as a political point of view. He next came to consider what was to be done in relation to the induction or otherwise of the presentee to the Church of Auchenarder. He argued in favour of giving the temporariness of the parish to Mr. Young, but at the same time he held that as the Church held the sacred right of ordination as a spiritual portion of the Established Church, and as they also maintained that congregations should have a voice in the choice of their ministers, because Mr. Young's appointment had been related by the congregation,—therefore they should refuse to ordain him to the charge of the parish. Dr. Chalmers then went on to explain more fully the nature of his intention in regard to the great question of refusing to present a minister to the parish—by patronage who might be disagreeable to the people. He hoped some arrangement, some new Act would be discovered fitted to meet the emergency; but if not, he would recommend that in every case similar to the Auchenarder, the Presbyteries should refuse to ordain. The State might, in virtue of the legal presentation, seize on the temporariness, but could not force the Church to ordain any minister presented to the State who attempted any thing of the kind, then it was guilty of gross persecution. The endowments might be altogether taken away from the Church, which he would consider the greatest calamity that could befall the nation; but, having in essence betwixt Erastianism on the one hand, and Voluntarism on the other, he was convinced that the manner of proceeding recommended by him of the procuring the sanction of Parliament to the veto act, or another in its place, was the best plan that could be adopted to steer betwixt these two points. Dr. Chalmers read numerous passages from the speeches of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Brougham in pronouncing sentence in the House of Lords, and demonstrated that the evident meaning and intention of that judgement was to secularize the Church. But he was confident the whole community would bid God speed to those patriotic individuals who were willing to give up their own personal rights and advantages for the sake of the Church,—inasmuch many of the patrons, extensive holders of the patronage of the Church. He hoped that such an admirable example would restrain the temper and feelings of all classes, during any after proceedings. These gentlemen were willing to abandon their personal rights until some arrangement was formed whereby the Church was to have its civil and collection rights restored to them. They were willing to give up wholly and ungrudgingly their hereditary rights, when they were convinced it was for the moral interests of the community. There was nothing which they were more desirous to see carried into effect than the exaltation of the right of the people in the choice of a pastor. It was not only their wish but their conviction that this ought to be. (Applause.) In consequence he hoped that the ark of their rights would be safe on the billows, would, under the skillful seamanship of her officers, pass undamaged through the thickest of the storm, and reach her haven of security in perfect safety. (Dr. Chalmers sat down amidst loud applause.)

Mr. Bruce, of Kennet, seconded Dr. Chalmers's motion. Dr. Mac' said he could not coincide with either of the propositions laid on the table of the house. There were three objects which he had in view in any resolution which might be come in. The first of them was to maintain the sacred powers of the Church for judging on their benefices; the second was for promoting the great end of a Christian ministry; and the third for defending and throwing a safeguard around the character, pro-action, and usefulness of a minister. He would assent to any plan combining the two reasons. The motion of Dr. Chalmers did point to the advancing spiritual interests of congregations; but the important consideration which related to the veto power of the Church was left out. With regard to the veto act, it did not introduce the power of the Church at all—it was the express will of the people which it referred to, whereby the power of the Church was extinguished; and that was the thing which he complained of. The reverend doctor, in reference to the proposal contained in Dr. Cook's motion, to fall back on the old provision of the Church in respect to preventions, maintained as much length that that step could not possibly now be adopted, as much of the real utility of the old plan had been affected by the veto law. They could not reconstruct that plan, but must adopt measures for raising a new and more efficient one. He maintained that the effect of the veto act was to alter the whole character of a Presbytery from a judicial court into a mere court of registration. It occurred to him, that immediately upon the presentation, the Presbytery should proceed to the trials of the preventions, in order to see if he possessed qualifications which authorized the Presbytery before whom he was first examined to give him his license. Supposing they were satisfied in this respect, although he was not found qualified for the particular charge to which he had been nominated, still there could be a certificate of character upon which he could fall back on a future occasion; and although not found eligible for one parish, he could be found perfectly qualified for another. The subject, he thought, ought to be submitted to a committee for consideration. The rev. doctor concluded by moving the following resolutions.

Resolved 1. That the Church, in order more effectually to accomplish that which has been nominally, and in design, her constituents relative to the calling and inducting of ministers, the securing for vacant parishes of persons not only irreproachable in moral character, sound in doctrine, and of adequate learning, but also suited to the parishes to which they are nominated, did pass the act on calls, commonly called the veto act.—2. That, in passing this act of her own will, and carrying it into effect, the Church was influenced by the belief that its act, being not only in its nature, but also in its consequences, strictly and purely spiritual, there was no necessity to obtain previously the concurrence of the Legislature to it.—3. That the decision of the Supreme Civil Tribunal, in the recent case of Auchterarder, has determined that consequences of this act do infringe on civil and parsonial rights; and that hence it is ascertained to have been incompetent for the General Assembly to enforce the said enactment, without having previously obtained the assent of the Legislature.—4. That the Church, however, while giving and inculcating implicit obedience to the decisions of the civil courts in all matters relating to a civil court, ought not to forego the steady prosecution of her own high purpose of securing more effectually the appointment of ministers not only sound in doctrine and morals, but also outside to the parishes to which they are nominated.—5. That the salubrity of preventions for the parishes to which they are nominated, and all circumstances and considerations for ascertaining that salubrity in each particular case, whether as to the situation or mind of the people, or as to the special qualifications of the preventions themselves, ought to become the subjects of investigation and judgment to Presbyteries, in the discharge of their solemn duty in the filling up of vacancies, as well as the usual and general qualifications in candidates for the sacred ministry.—6. That a committee be appointed to consider and report as to the plan which may be best calculated for attaining this important end, and whereby, consistently with the acknowledgement and enforcement of such civil rights as are recognised by the law of the land, the spiritual interests of the Christian people, the judicial character and privileges of the ecclesiastical courts, and the professional character and usefulness of probationers, may be effectually maintained, and the union between Church and State preserved entire.

The Earl of Dalhousie said, as he was not altogether satisfied with the two first motions, he begged to second Dr. Muir's. Dr. Byrge, Mr. Clark, of Inverness, Mr. Whigham, Dr. Burns, Principal Macfarlane, Mr. Earle Mountrich, Mr. Caudlish, and others then addressed the Assembly.

Dr. Cook having replied, the Assembly divided on Dr. Chalmers's motion, against Dr. Muir's, when the former was carried by a majority of 36,—the number being, for Dr. Chalmers's motion, 197; and for Dr. Muir's motion, 161.

The Assembly again divided on Dr. Cook's and Dr. Chalmers's motions, when the latter was carried by a majority of 49, the numbers being 204 to 155.

The announcement was received by those in the gallery with loud cheers.

After the minutes were read, and several members had indicated their adherence to the dissent of Dr. Cook.

Dr. Cook then rose and stated that he must be sitting on the committee appointed under Dr. Chalmers's motion. His reasons we did not hear.

The Earl of Dalhousie made a similar declaration. Though he did not entirely agree with the resolution, he did not consider it so objectionable as to justify him in refusing to act on the committee, but the character of the resolution had been materially affected by the colouring given to it in the speech of the reverend doctor. He (Lord Dalhousie) did not consider the reverend doctor a leader of the party in the Church who are understood to take up extreme views; but the resolutions before, and after the reverend doctor's speech, were very different things. He was prepared to go the full length of the principle of the resolution,—that no minister should be intrusted on a congregation,—that no congregation should be compelled to take as minister the man appointed as how any sound objection could be stated. He was prepared to go to Parliament to ratify the resolution, and he had no doubt such a declaratory act would be obtained; but he contended that the Church would never get an act of the Legislature to ratify the veto act of 1834. No Act of Parliament will ever be obtained to ratify that act as it has now been explained by the reverend doctor. The vote of last night had alienated some of the fairest and firmest friends of the Church, and he could name several.

Dr. Laird, interrupting, complained that Lord Dalhousie was not in order.

Earl of Dalhousie—I was speaking in order. I was stating my reasons why I cannot act on the committee; and I say that the allegiance of many of the Church's firmest friends has been greatly shaken, if they have not altogether broken from me. (Cries of No, no, hear, hear, and great sensation throughout the whole house.) This is the first, and I believe it will be the last speech with which I shall trouble this house,—for when I have finished I shall withdraw myself from the Assembly. Among the first words I uttered in public I said that I was born and bred a Presbyterian, and that I intended to continue such. I still adhere to that declaration. I shall remain a member of the Establishment as long as it exists; but I am afraid the time will soon come when there will be no Establishment to adhere to. (No, no, hear, hear.) I shall continue a member of the Church, and perform the duties of an elder, as I have hitherto done, in the parish where I reside, but shall not again consent to sit in the judicatures of any Church which, glow it as you may, has renounced dogmatically but virtually to set at defiance the law of the land. (Reserved confusion.) I am well aware that the Church, as a Church, may continue to exist, though it may not receive a shilling of State endowment. It did not require the declaration of the reverend doctor yesterday to convince me that the Church might survive disjunction from the State; but what I mean and say is, that the kirk is now rung out of the Establishment of the Church of Scotland. (Hear, hear, and so on.) Lord Dalhousie then walked out of the Assembly.—Scottish Patriot, May 29.

RELIGIOUS.

THE REV. W. H. BELL—A faithful and zealous Wesleyan Missionary, has been expelled from Calcutta, where, for nearly two years and a half, a branch of the Gibraltar Mission has been established for the benefit of the British and American seamen who visit that port; and where a Spanish school had been commenced, and an oratory opened, in which Mr. Bell conducted the devotions of a few Spaniards, who were desirous to attend Protestant worship.—Watchman.

EDUCATION.

Extract from the Minutes of the Committee of Council appointed to superintend the application of any sums voted by Parliament for the purpose of promoting public Education:—

April 18th, 1839.

Read, The following scheme for the future guidance of the committee; viz.,

"To found a school, in which candidates for the office of teacher in schools for the poorer classes, may acquire the knowledge necessary to the exercise of their future profession, and may be trained in the most approved methods of religious and moral training and instruction.

"This school to include a model school, in which children of all ages, from three to fourteen, may be taught and trained, in sufficient numbers to form an infant school, as well as schools for children above seven.

"Religious instruction to be considered as general and special. Religion to be combined with the whole matter of instruction, and to regulate the entire system of discipline.

"Periods to be set apart for such peculiar doctrinal instruction as may be required for the religious training of the children.

"To appoint a chaplain to conduct the religious instruction of children, whose parents or guardians belong to the Established Church.

"The parent or natural guardian of any other child to be permitted to secure the attendance of the licensed minister of his own persuasion, at the period appointed for special religious instruction, in order to give such instruction apart.

"To appoint a licensed minister to give such special religious instruction, wherever the number of children in attendance on the model school belonging to any religious body discharging from the Established Church, is such as to appear to this committee to require such special provision.

"A portion of every day to be devoted to the reading of the Scriptures to the school, under the general direction of the committee, and superintendence of the rector. Roman Catholics, if their parsons or guardians resolve it, to read their own version of the Scriptures, either at the times fixed for reading the Scriptures, or at the hours of special instruction.

"To arrange the classes in separate rooms or sections of the same apartment, divided by partitions, so as to enable the simultaneous method to be applied to 40 or 50 children of similar proficiency.

"To adopt means to assemble a greater number of children for simultaneous instruction on subjects not so technical as to require a division into classes of 20.

"To include instruction in industry as a special department of the moral training of the children.

"To give such a character to the matter of instruction in the school, as to keep it in close relation with the condition of workmen and servants.

"Besides the physical training of the children in various employments, to introduce such exercises during the hours of recreation as will develop their strength and activity.

"To render the moral training of the children at all times an object of special solicitude.

"Normal School.
"To provide apartments for the residence of the candidate teachers.

"To construct the class-rooms, so as to afford the candidate teachers an opportunity of attending each class in the model school, without distracting the attention of the children or of the teacher.

"To provide means for the instruction of the candidate teachers in the theory of their art, and for furnishing them with whatever knowledge is necessary for success in it.

"To appoint a reader to give lectures on the method and matter of instruction, and on the whole art of training children of the poor. To regulate the reading and exercises of the candidate teachers, and to examine them. To determine the order in which they may be admitted to the practice of their art in the school, and at length intrusted with the conjoint management of classes, and to superintend their ultimate examination, subject to the rules of this committee.

"The religious instruction of the candidate teachers to form an essential and prominent element of their studies, and no certificate to be granted unless the authorised religious teacher has previously attested his confidence in the character, religious knowledge, and zeal of the candidate whose religious instruction he has superintended.

"The religious instruction of all candidate teachers connected with the Established Church, to be committed to the chaplain, and the special religious instruction to be committed (in any case in which a wish to that effect is expressed) to the licensed minister of the religious persuasion of the candidate teacher, who is to attend the school at stated periods, to assist and examine the candidate teachers in their reading on religious subjects, and to afford them spiritual advice.

"The candidate teachers to all other respects to conform to such regulations as respects the entire external economy of the household as may be issued by the rector, with the approval of this committee.

"To provide accommodation in the model school for at least 450 children, who should lodge in the household—viz., 190 infants, 200 boys and girls receiving ordinary instruction, and 50 boys and 50 girls receiving superior instruction, and 50 children probably absent from sickness or other causes.

"To establish a day school of 150 or 200 children of all ages and both sexes, in which the candidate teachers may realise the application of the best methods of instruction, under the limitations and obstructions which must arise in a small village or town day school.

"Grants to Societies.
"A grant not exceeding £2,500, to be made to the National Society, and the British and Foreign School Society, for the establishment of their Normal Schools, but no further grant to be made.

"Secretary and Inspectors.
"To appoint a Secretary.

"To appoint Inspectors, not exceeding at first two in number, to carry on an inspection of schools which have been or may be hereafter aided by grants of public money, and to convey to conductors and teachers of private schools in different parts of the country a knowledge of all improvements to the art of teaching, and likewise to report to this committee the progress made in education from year to year.

"Gratuities to Teachers.
"To grant gratuities to such teachers as may appear to deserve encouragement.

"Grants for building Schools.
"Not to adhere invariably to the rule which confines grants to the National Society and the British and Foreign School, and not to give the preference in all cases whatever to the school to which the largest proportion is subscribed.

"To advance in no case more than one-half of the expense of building a school.

"To expend in grants for the building of schools not more in any one year than 10,000*l.*

Resolved.—That, subject to such alterations as experience may hereafter suggest, the foregoing scheme be approved.—Christ. Adv.

BLACKBURN ON RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.—"There is something," says Mr. Blackburn, "absolutely ludicrous in the way in which men talk about the use of the Authorized Version in schools, as though it were identical with the communication of religious instruction. It seems to be in the estimation of some persons almost an axiom, that, where this version is used, there is of necessity religious teaching, and where it is not used such teaching cannot exist. There is in this a double fallacy. You may use the Authorized Version largely and constantly in a school, and yet the influence produced upon the minds of the pupils may be such, in consequence, and as the direct effect of its use, as to be more calculated to make them infidels than Christians;—and, on the other hand, the very best kind and the very largest degree of really valuable Christian teaching may be carried out, of which such an institution is capable, where neither the Authorized Version nor any other of the whole Bible is ever seen. The influence of a school in this respect depends incomparably more upon the character of the teacher and superintendents, than upon the books used. In one school, the Bible may be constantly in the hands of the children, and yet they may all the while be learning to despise it, and receiving impressions in relation to it which will be of ruinous tendency in after life, and no teacher is afforded. In another, selections and abstracts alone may be used, but the pupils may acquire an extensive knowledge of the contents of Scripture, and acquire it in such a way as will lead them to reverence it, and repair to it in their subsequent course as an instruction and a guide. Better that the Bible were never seen in any schools in this country, than used, or rather abused, as it is. Unless it be treated with reverence, and employed solely for the purpose of communicating religious instruction, it had far better never be used at all.

"The practice of attempting to teach religion in schools for secular learning does not appear to me, abstractly considered, as highly desirable. In a better state of society, when the influence of genuine religion is more widely diffused, it will be a great measure abandoned in its application to the secular class, as it already is by the more affluent portion of the community. It is at present a matter of absolute necessity, resulting from the degraded and utterly irreligious character of our population. Were parents impressed with a sense of the duty they owe to their children, and capable of discharging it aright, it would not only be unnecessary that religion should be taught in day schools, but themselves would object to it, and declining any influence but their own, and that of persons in whose they had entire confidence, to be exercised upon the minds of those committed to their care on this all-important subject. The interest felt on this point by our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, contrasts not greatly to our honour with the reckless indifference, of a large portion of our own Protestant population."—Fad.

HOW TO KEEP MILK FRESH.—When milk contained in wire-corked bottles is heated to the boiling point in a water-bath, the oxygen of the enclosed small portion of air under the cork becomes to be carbonated, and the milk will afterwards keep fresh, it is said a year or two, as green gooseberries and pears do by the same treatment.—Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Arts.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE QUEEN.—We understand from good authority that the Queen's attention to business is unrelenting; that neither exercise, amusement, sleep, nor even meals, are allowed to cause the least delay in her public service; and that inactivity and forgetfulness of whatever duty is concerned, there are few who might not benefit by her example. She has been known to rise and leave the room just seated at the dinner table, leaving her attendants to attend to her request, while her attention has been first given to the hurried dispatch-box. As Her Majesty has never appointed a private secretary, political affairs pass through her hands but those of the Sovereign and her Ministers. Not many people are allowed the labour which is thus entailed upon her. The character of the Queen is national property, and time only is required for the country fully to appreciate the quiet perseverance, gentleness, and firmness which will be found united in that of our youthful Sovereign.—Manchester Guardian.

PROFESSIONAL LAZY.—The ambition of adopting "professional life" of all kinds, at the present day, is the source of countless instances of misery. Every profession in England is overstocked; not merely the prizes are beyond the general reach, but the merest subsistence becomes difficult. "The three black robes, law, physic, and divinity," are weary of their innumerable worshippers, and yearly sentence crowds of them to perdition of the aching sense of failure. A few glittering successes allure the multitude: chancellorships, bishoprics, and regiments, figure before the public eye; and every aspirant from the cottage, and the more foolish parents of every aspirant, set down the bundle as gained, when they have once plunged their unlucky offspring into the sea of troubles which men call the world. But thousands have died of broken hearts in those pursuits—thousands who would have been happy behind the plough, or opulent behind the counter—thousands, in the desperate struggles of thankless professions, look upon the simplicity of a life of manual labour with perpetual envy—and thousands, by a worse fate still, are driven to necessities which degrade the principle of honour within them, sometimes then to humiliating modes of obtaining subsistence, and make up, by administering to the vice of society, the evil which is refused to their legitimate exertions.—Blackwood's Magazine.

REFORM OF THE REFORM BILL.—The main body of the Reform party is determined on the amendment of the representative system. They require it because they see no hope without it of practical universal suffrage; they require it because they desire that identification of the House of Commons with the nation which was anticipated from the Reform Act. They have borne with the backwardness and compromises of Ministers till their own credit for consistency suffered; and they have forbore to press their convictions of needful change till the cause of Reform itself suffered, rather than divide the strength by which Toryism was excluded from power. If this forbearance be continued, it will assume a very different character. It is no longer a source of strength, but of weakness. To prolong it will be to deceive the Queen, and to betray the people. It has run its course, and come to the end of its applicability to our circumstances. The time of things which demanded Lord Melbourne's resignation was demanded the abandonment of this forbearing policy. As a barrier against the Tories it thus broke down. Its strength, even as a defensive policy, was gone. The Queen stands alone in the breach. Only by a Reform policy can the Reformers support her—only by that can they stand their own ground. Their support of the Ministers must become identified with the support of progressive Reform—they must make this distinctly understood by the Ministry and the nation, or theirs will be the desertion that leaves both the Queen and the country to be subjugated by a faction.—Morning Chronicle.

THE CHANCERY are not the only class of people who are disturbing the peace of society by their "demonstrations." At Cambridge, on Monday last, an organized mob of overgrown school-bellied undergraduates, stormed the Town-hall during a public meeting of the inhabitant house-holders, convened to agree upon an address to the Queen, and, having battered in the doors, rushed in with shouts, yells, and screams, to testify their loyalty and churchmanship after the Tory fashion. The scene of confusion which ensued, seems to have approached to a regular Irish riot. The Mayor at length with difficulty read the Riot Act, but the mob did not disperse till night came on. Such is the discipline of our Universities! These undisciplined Tories are the future pillars of our Apostolic Establishment. What would be said, if the students at University College, or of any Dissenting Seminary, were to take a dissenting stand of leading in a Tory meeting with a chief magistrate in the chair? Talk of the lower classes! These young monks might learn both manners and morals from the Birmingham operatives. Since writing the above, we see in this morning's papers an account of a second disgraceful riot of the gowansmen, having for its object to put down by violence an anti-morn-law lecturer, which terminated in a fight between the gowansmen and the townsmen. Surely it is high time that the police of the University were placed in more efficient hands.—Pat.

SIR ROBERT PEEL has declined an invitation to come forward at the next election as a candidate for the representation of North Lancashire.—Ibid.

RIOT.—Liverpool has been the scene of riot and confusion, caused apparently by the intemperate conduct of a number of ship-carpenters who provoked the Irish laborers beyond endurance. The riot was quelled by the police, but not till a number of hands had been broken.—Christ. Adv.

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—On the 20th of next month the speed of the mail trains on the London and Birmingham Railway will be accelerated. The day mail will leave Euston-grove station at half-past 9 in the morning, and will arrive in Birmingham in 5 hours. A stoppage of 8 minutes will be allowed at King, 10 minutes at Wolverhampton, 5 minutes at Wrentham, and 5 minutes at Coventry; making a total of 30 minutes occupied by the stoppage, and only 4 hours and 35 minutes in performing the journey of 116 miles 6 furlongs. The day mail train from Birmingham will accomplish the journey in the same time, allowing the same stoppages at the different places above mentioned. The night mail train will leave Euston-grove station at half-past 8, and complete the distance in 5 hours and a half; the stoppages to be for the same periods and at the same places as those named for the day mail trains.—Ibid.

THE DEARB AND BIRMINGHAM JUNCTION RAILWAY will be opened to the public at the end of June, or early in July; and by the spring of next year the railroad to York, by this and the North Midland line, will be opened, giving an entire line from London to that city.—Derby Mercury.

LONDON AND CROYDON RAILWAY.—It is intended to open the line for public traffic on Monday. The railway itself is even now ready to receive the trains with the exception of the point where it joins the Greenwich line, and at which, from the frequent passage of the trains to and fro, operations are necessarily carried on very slowly.—Railway Times.

THE PAXES, like the coral insect, is daily creating for itself a new habitation, even in the remote seas of the Pacific. The Sandwich Islands, but a few years since inhabited only by barbarians, and unknown to the rest of the world, have now their own newspaper, uniting to the most improved and the most civilized society. The Sandwich Islands Gazette, published at Honolulu, Oahu, has already made considerable progress, and emulates the journals of old established colonies. It is curious to read some of the advertisements in this Gazette of the antipodes, where "Jenkins and Stuppelbeen, sailors," residing "near the King's Palace," recommend the fashionable cut of their clothes to customers whom we never suspected of being so fastidious; where an auctioneer's notice disposes of goods, chattels, and estates as freely, though it may not be quite so frequently, as George Robinson; and where a demand for "bookbinders" indicates that literature is not confined to the broad sheet alone. Truly this is amongst the triumphs of the press!—Pat.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—The travelling on this line to Maidenhead has greatly increased by the favorable change of the weather, and appears likely, as the summer comes on, greatly to exceed that in the corresponding period of last year. During the week ending the 5th instant, upwards of 13,000 passengers were conveyed, and the receipts, we believe, exceeded 2,000*l.* The Directors, last week, took contract for some miles of the line between Bath and the village of Box, and the contracts now advertised to be taken on the 20th instant, will complete the entire line between Bristol and London, with the exception of a small portion near Bath, and one or two bridges, for which the plans will soon be ready. We understand that, generally speaking, the works along the line are pushed forward with great energy, and though much remains to be done before the bridges and tunnels in this vicinity can be completed, there seems no doubt that the line to Bath will be ready for traffic in the course of the next three months. About half a mile of the great tunnel at Box is now completed, and not the slightest difficulty exists in keeping the works free from water. Where the excavation is carried through the oolite or freestones, the work proceeds with a rapidity greater than that required by the contract.—Bristol Mercury.

LONG WINTER.—There was a heavy fall of snow as early as the 15th of October, and another on the same day in May, making an actual winter of seven months.—Pat.

THE COLD IN LONDON during the last few days has increased. Yesterday it was intense, with hail-storms of long duration. Frost is severely felt in the gardens, and vegetation much retarded.—Ibid.

THE HAGUE, MAY 23.—The Royal Family is again plunged into affliction. His Illustrious Prince William, eldest son of Duke Bernhard, of Saxe Weimar, died yesterday morning, after a few days' illness.—Ibid.

PETERBURGH, APRIL 24.—The Winter continues, the sky is obscure, we have snow every day, and often in the evening frost, with the thermometer at 10 deg. and 12 deg. (Reaumur) below freezing point. This long continuance of cold has had a very unfavourable effect in several provinces. In the Baltic provinces there is an extreme scarcity of forage, and in some districts the farmers have been obliged to take the butcher off their habitations to keep their cattle from starving.—Ibid.

LORD DUNHAM'S REPORT.—We have read from the personal of this admirable expedition of the state of the British Colonies in North America, with a higher estimate of the powers of the noble Lord, and a more sanguine anticipation of the ultimate termination of colonial misrule, than we had ever ventured to form. We did not believe that there was a noblesman in Britain who had the ability and firmness to grapple with the great questions committed to Lord Dufferin's care, to a spirit so searching and yet so frank; nor a man who, in one short summer, could collect and digest so much information, and draw from it such a volume of instruction to the government and people of England. It is impossible for a colonist to read this report dispassionately through, and not recognize on every page the features of that system which has now become so antipathetic in the eyes of every man of common understanding, who has no interest in keeping it up. We wish a copy of this report was in the hands of every head of a family in Nova Scotia; for, although we shall take some pains, by extracts and abstracts, to give our readers some knowledge of its contents, it is a volume that every colonist should have upon his shelf. The people of Nova Scotia should study it as the best exposition that has yet been given of the causes of the dissensions in the Colonies, and containing the best suggestion for the avoidance of kindred troubles in all the provinces, that has yet appeared. The remedy for the state of conflict between the people and the local executives, which prevails or has prevailed in all the colonies, has two prime recommendations, being perfectly simple and eminently British: it is, to let the majority and not the minority govern, and compel every governor to select his advisers from those who enjoy the confidence of the people, and can command a majority in the popular branches.—Nova-Scotia, April 11.

NOMO WR.—It is related that a negro was found asleep by his master in one of his plantations, and was reprimanded by him for his indolence. "I see you are afraid of work, Alabaster!" The negro replied, "Oh no, massa, me no 'fraid o' work; me go to sleep close by um."—Pail.

 — 12. At Agm, after an illness of two days, Mr. Christopher Bowman, Deputy Commissary of Ordnance, aged seventy-four years and five months. Mr. Bowman was by birth a native of Germany; he entered the King's Service in 1767, and arrived at Madras in 1768. He was present at the sieges of Bangalore, Pattee, and Secunderabad, and in other engagements with the Army, under the command of Lord Cornwallis, and was twice wounded. In 1786, he served on board the William Pitt, when two French Privateers were taken. He then entered the Company's Service, and was at the Java Islands in 1797. In 1798, he joined the grand army under the command of General Harris, was at the battle and defeat of Tippon's army, and at the siege and storming of Seringapatnam, where he received a severe wound in the foot, the effects of which he felt till his death. He afterwards served under Colonel W. Wellesley and Lord Lake. Mr. Bowman attained the highest grade, which it is possible for a private soldier in the Company's Service to reach; he passed through the intermediate steps with honour, and with the often expressed approbation of his superiors. His life had been one of varied peril and adventure, and many were the "bale-breathed escapes" in imminent deadly brunt he could recount. But his sincere and unfeigned piety constituted his chief merit; he was long known as a benevolent, humble, and warm-hearted Christian, and a liberal contributor to religious institutions. His pure and exertions were ever ready to be devoted to benevolent objects. He spent a long and useful life, and a large circle of friends have to deplore that a good man hath departed from the midst of them.

FALL OF GHIZNI.—The fall of Ghizni, which was stormed by the ARMY OF THE INDUS, on the morning of the 23d of July, is the most memorable event in the campaign of Affghanistan. It is so decisive in its character and effects, that no subsequent event is likely to eclipse it. Dost Mahomed Khan appears to have calculated on Ghizni's offering a long resistance; and he collected in it whatever was necessary for its defence. He appears to have staked his throne on Ghizni; and its fall leaves him without means of farther opposition, and deprives his remaining troops of all confidence. The loss of life entailed by the storm, is much to be deplored; yet it is not improbable that it may be the means of preventing a further effusion of blood; and by inspiring the Affghans with a just opinion of British skill and valor, secure the peaceful occupation of the country. Had we obtained possession of the capital, without a single military achievement, an impression might have been left on the minds of the people, that our path to Cabul had been opened by gold, and not by valor; and such an idea, supported, as it would have been, by the fact that large sums had been disbursed to disarm opposition, would necessarily have been pregnant with future calamity. It would have lowered the British character, and engendered hopes of successful resistance. But the gallant capture of this fort, hitherto deemed impregnable, in the short space of two hours, will spread the renown of our prowess beyond the gates of Herat, and inspire a salutary terror in the minds of the Affghans.

The fall of this place brings with it a crowd of reflections. The rights which were consecrated, in the recollections of the Mahomedans, by a thousand years of glory, has fallen into the hands of their successors. The cycle from whence the first Mahomedan conqueror descended twelve times, to ravage the plains of India; the citadel from whence, in succeeding ages, he after host issued forth, to pour a stream of desolation on the fertile plains of Hindoostan, is now in the hands of Christians. By an inscrutable, but irresistible, impulse, we have been led to the conquest of province after province in India; and after having extinguished the Mahomedan power within the Indus, have been drawn across that stream, up to the cradle of their empire, and in that venerated city have had an opportunity of displaying the same valor, which has made us the empire of the East. To what a stupendous size has this our empire grown, in the compass of a single century. History may be searched in vain for another instance of such rapidity of growth and consolidation. The mind is fatigued in tracing the rapid strides which the force of circumstances has constrained the British to take, and those circumstances are still in active operation. There appears to be every probability that the Nepalese and Burmese will force Government, however unwilling, into a war with them. It is not improbable, therefore, that in one and the same year, a British army will have taken military possession of the cities of Candahar and Rangoon, separated from each other by a distance of more than two thousand miles; and that, with the exception of the Punjab, hemmed in by British troops before and behind, through this vast extent of territory, not a sword will be lifted, without the permission of England. When we reflect, that the empire has expanded to its present stupendous dimensions, from the small original principle of a humble factory, in the brief space of eighty-two years, within the limits of a single life, our astonishment is still farther heightened. The nobleman, the Earl of Powis, of whose death the late mail has brought us intelligence, may be said to have touched with the two extremes of his protracted life, the period during which this political miracle has been accomplished. He was of the tender age of three or four, when his illustrious father, the great Clive, laid the foundation of this magnificent empire; and after having re-established the British factory by force, placed on record those prophetic words; "You cannot stop here; you must go forward." Before his son, the late Earl, had quitted this mortal scene of things, the British standard waved upon the walls of Candahar.

THE OPIUM TRADE AND THE CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.—Our contemporary has furnished the public, in his last number, with a good article on the Opium crisis in China. We fully sympathize with him in all the virtuous indignation which he has poured upon the nefarious traffic. Our sentiments upon this great moral question have been so completely in unison with his, that we thought it next to impossible for any diversity of opinion to exist upon any branch of it. Yet the whole tenor of the article, by an appearance of combating both us and the traffic together, places us in rather an awkward position. We must, therefore, have a word of explanation with our brother, upon the two points on which we are apparently at issue: the violence of the reproof, and the ease with which the breach may be closed.

We regret to learn from him, that Government is about to make advances for another season of Opium, because it will do Government much harm in China, and still more harm in England; and because it is doing that which a great and magnanimous Government ought to be above doing. We flattered ourselves, that the lessons of adversity taught to the public authorities; first, by the necessity of giving a bonus of thirty lakhs of Rupees to stimulate exportation; and then by the destruction of two millions worth of Opium by Chinese violence or virtue, would have cured them of the folly of dabbling again in this article. But the drug appears to exercise the same pernicious influence, to produce the same oblivion of reason and equity in those who raise and export it, as in those who smoke it. While the grave of twenty thousand chests is yet fresh, Government has determined to spend the public resources in providing victims for a second tomb. We regret that the opportunity, so happily created by circumstances, has been lost, for withdrawing from the cultivation of the drug, as a State monopoly; and that the jurisdiction of the article has not been left to private speculation, if not altogether prohibited.

Turn we now from the transgressions of the British Government to those of the Chinese, which our contemporary is reluctant to admit. He is at a loss to comprehend what national violence has been committed by the Chinese. We will endeavour to make the matter clear. The Chinese authorities had never given the English merchants reason to think that they ever had been, or ever would be, in earnest, in the exclusion of Opium. The merchants had seen, time after time, edicts against the trade turned into instruments of extortion. It was known throughout the empire; it was known in the Cabinet of Peking, that the Governorship of the Province of Canton was the most lucrative post in the Emperor's gift, chiefly, if not entirely, on account of the Opium traffic. The Governor of Canton, after submitting the inperial edicts against Opium in the morning, sent his own smuggling boats in the evening to receive the drug. Thus, in spite of the moral edicts of the paternal Emperor, the merchants were lulled into security, and naturally imbibed the opinion, that edicts which were never executed, and which the Chinese authorities were the first to break, were but so much waste paper. The continuance of the Opium trade was, therefore, quite as much owing to the Chinese Government, as to the English merchants; yet those merchants have alone been the victims of the Commissioner's severity.

Capt. Elliot had been recognized by the Chinese authorities, as the Representative of the British nation. They had solicited him in that capacity to act against the Opium smugglers at the beginning of the year: in that capacity he had met their wishes. He had declared his determination to co-operate with the public authorities of Canton, in carrying the Emperor's wishes into effect. While in the peaceful exercise of his functions, he proceeded to Canton, with a confidence in the sacredness of his person, to adjust matters with the new Commissioner Lin. He was seized by that functionary, and threatened with starvation, unless he would deliver up twenty thousand chests of Opium. The fact that the Opium was demanded of Capt. Elliot, and received from him; and that a receipt was granted to him in his official capacity for the whole quantity, proves, beyond a doubt, that his political character was recognized, as much by Lin, as it had been by the Governor of Canton. To treat him with this unheard-of outrage; to threaten him with death, and thus to obtain possession of the Opium; what was it but to obtain it by an act of national violence? The Commissioner had an undoubted right to confiscate all the Opium he could seize; but he had no right to starve the British Minister into the surrender of the Opium, which he had not the power to obtain possession of.

Respecting the ease or difficulty of providing a remedy for the present state of things, we have the misfortune to differ with our contemporary. It seems to us to present one of the most difficult problems in political science; but this Christian Advocate remarks:

"We think, without laying claim to any peculiar share of either the one or the other, we can inform the Friend:—trade with China for every other article of commerce, on honourable terms,—cease to force Opium upon the people, leave the iniquity and consequent profit of the traffic to those who are willing to trade in it,—in a word, let us do justice, and love mercy, and walk in integrity before this heathen people and our God, and we can then see not a "distant opening of relief" from present difficulties, but the opening of a door wide and effectual for the introduction of that Gospel by which alone China can be blessed and become celestial indeed."

If this course was optional with the fair and legitimate trader, there would be an end to the difficulty; but, unfortunately, the Chinese Government, always puffed up with an idea of its own sublime importance, has become perfectly rampant by its recent success; and the seizure of the Opium is considered not somewhat a triumph over the contraband traders, as over the British nation. By a new law, traffic in Opium is made punishable by death; and every merchant is required to sign a bond, making himself responsible, with his property and life, for the non-introduction of the drug. The fact, whether any merchant has been engaged or not, in the contraband trade, upon the decision of which hangs his existence, is to be settled finally, and irrevocably, by Chinese tribunals! With what degree of impartiality those tribunals will exercise the dangerous power over the lives of Europeans, with which they are now vested, may be judged of by the example which the Imperial Commissioner Lin has set them. Not only did he detain, and threaten with starvation, the whole English community, without discriminating the innocent from the guilty, as well as the American and Dutch merchants, who had no concern in the traffic; but when he made a selection of sixteen of those who were supposed to be most deeply implicated in the trade, to be detained as hostages, it turned out that the majority of them had never been engaged in Opium transactions! This is a sample of that Chinese justice, to which all foreigners are now to be subjected, without the possibility of any interference on the part of their respective Consuls. We have the authority of those, whose opinions on Chinese matters, from their knowledge of the national character, outweigh those of ordinary men, for saying, "that the signing of this bond is tantamount to a man's signing his own death warrant." How is this state of things to be brought to a termination? No representation from English barbarians will carry any weight with the Chinese authorities; and there appears to be no opening for an arrangement by which the fair trader may be protected in his transactions, and the punishment denounced against smuggling be confined to those who engage in it.

BRITISH INDIA SOCIETY.—A Native friend has sent us a copy of the Prospectus of the British India Society, which we publish in this number. We must confess that we set down to the perusal of it with no little mistrust. The exaggerations which disfigured the speeches of those who resorted at its formation, gave little hope that a Society made of such auspices, could accomplish much good for this empire. In common with our contemporaries, we felt digged in the calamities of the season brought forward as a charge against Government, and the horrors of famine paraded with officious zeal in order to injure those who had been the most active in endeavouring to mitigate them. We felt that it had been proposed to establish a Society for the prevention of famines in India,—and a more laudable object cannot be conceived,—all the revolting particulars of the late famine would have been in perfect keeping with such an object; but this Society which professes to aim at the permanent regeneration of this Government, could not employ such an argument drawn from events over which that Government had no control, without great danger to its own credit. When, however, we perceived the more calm and dignified tone in which the Prospectus was drawn up, and noticed the tangible objects to which the Society's attention was to be directed, we felt that it was the harbinger of good to India. The existence of a body of men publicly associated for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information regarding the condition of India, and of removing the apathy with which its affairs have been so long regarded, is an event of happy omen. Judging from the Prospectus, we are led to believe that the Society will lend itself to no factious views, will propagate no information which is not in accordance with severe and rigid truth, and patronize no opinions which will not stand the ordeal of a close investigation.

Composed, as the Committee is, in most part, of men who have witnessed, with their own eyes, the actual condition of the country, they will not fail to recognize the fact, that the evils which afflict India are far more of a social, than of a political, kind; and that those social impediments to happiness are of so deep-rooted and inveterate a character, as to huddle the utmost efforts of the political authorities for the welfare of India. How few in India, of all countries, are those evils which Government can remove? How extremely limited is the range of its influence on the happiness, or the misery, of the people. For our part, we consider that the chief blessing of our political administration, consists in those efforts which are directed to the removal of the social evils, which have so long filled the land with misery. Yet even this process must be exceedingly slow. If we could suppose a perfect Government established in India to-morrow—a Government that should realize the most utopian expectations of the most sanguine politician, would it be able to confer happiness on the people? Could it throw down that unnatural barrier of caste, which condemns three-fourths of the people to hopeless degradation; and raises the remaining fourth to a pernicious, and always abused, elevation? Would it remove the misery, under which the country groans, from the unnatural system of marriage which prevails in it, and the still more unnatural condemnation of widows to the languor and miseries of perpetual widowhood? Would it eradicate the inveterate principles of bribery and corruption, by which even the best laws must become nugatory? Would it give moral courage to the lower classes, and thus enable them to protect themselves against the oppressions of the rich and great? Would it give moral virtue to the higher classes, or moderation and mercy to seminaries? Would it remove that universal propensity to debt, by which the country is divided into two classes, insolvents and creditors? Would it, above all, be able to counteract the baneful effects of that superstition, which prostrates human reason to the worship of beasts; and to which may be traced the general debasement of the country? These are triumphs beyond the power of political institutions, and yet until the social evils of the country are removed, the efforts of the wisest and most paternal Government, for the benefit of the country, must be in a great measure, neutralized. While, therefore, the new Society keeps its eye on the improvement of the political condition of India, we hope its attention will be more particularly drawn to its social degradation and misery.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS.—In our correspondence department will be found three communications of much value and interest on the subject of oaths. To our Correspondent, J. K. E., we beg to return our thanks for his prompt reply to our question. He thinks the idolatrous symbol has considerable influence with the majority of Hindoos; which, however, is materially increased by the ceremonial of administration—that is, we suppose, by the impressive manner in which the witness may be adjured. This opinion of J. K. E. certainly appears to be reasonable; yet we must acknowledge, our confidence in his judgement is not a little shaken by his farther opinion, that truth is not only occasionally elicited by the administration of oaths, but is so in the majority of instances. As so large a proportion of the witnesses are put upon their oath, is not this nearly tantamount to saying that, in our Courts, the truth is, in most cases, distinctly ascertained? And yet an opinion more inconsistent with fact, we believe, could scarcely be expressed. Are the current witticisms so utterly groundless, that a Judge may as safely decree for the suitor with most consonants in his name, or least hair on his head, as for him whose evidence appears the most complete? Our Correspondent, Index, seems to be of a very different mind from J. K. E. His opinion is, that it is not altogether to be denied, that upon particular occasions, an oath may be the means of drawing out a true statement, though generally it has not this desired effect, but only deters the better description of witnesses from appearing in Court to give their testimony. Perjury, he asserts, is fearfully common, and is practised daily, and even professionally, with impunity. We confess all our information leads us to consider the representation of Index as the more accurate. How often do our Judges retire from Cutchery, perfectly sickened by the revolting exhibition they have had before them of gross, reckless, and complicated falsehood and perjury! If, however, they will vigorously work the Construction of the Sudder Nizamut, quoted by Index, “that wilful perjury and contradiction is an offence punishable as contempt of Court,” they may expect to see a better state of things before long. It would be an infinite blessing to the people, were they, by such means, brought even to some tolerable caution, in their aberrations from the truth.

As to the inquiry of Index, how it was that oath-taking was originally ordered by our Government, we can form no conjecture, except that its members must have participated in the once universal conviction, and most flattering fiction, that English Law is the very perfection of reason and equity, and, therefore, oath-taking, which is nearly the beginning, middle, and end of its resources for preventing deception and falsehood, and eliciting truth, is of sovereign power, and indispensable for the ends of justice. People are not so unanimous now in that hallucination: and we hope our Indian system of jurisprudence may have all the benefit of the reformed opinions.

To the letter of our correspondent, T. we would beg to call particular attention. We believe few members of the Civil Service have more carefully examined the subject on which he writes. He has had much experience, and on this matter in particular, is a practical experimentalist. He has for some time ceased to administer the ordinary Heathen and Mahomedan oaths, and has substituted the solemn declarations of the Regulations, worded as oaths and not mere declarations: and now he assures us the experiment has proved thoroughly successful. Of the benefit of the substitution, he says, “I am daily more satisfied; and the fear and reverence with which they are taken, promises greatly to insure a blessing on our administration of justice; and, it is my belief, on the people themselves.”

On the question, whether oaths should be altogether discontinued, or merely relief be granted to the consciences both of the Judges and deponents, in respect of the form of oath used, we shall not again enter at present. As a matter of religious principle, we have never been able to arrive at a decision, whether an oath is allowable in a Christian or not. The prohibition of the gospel, “Swear not at all,” may, possibly, not be of universal application: it may not, include judicial oaths, but be limited to profane swearing and rash vows. Yet it looks to be so general in its expression, that any conscientious person may well be uncomfortable in taking an oath in any case, in the face of it. But irrespective of religious principle of this sort, we have no hesitation in deciding against the use of oaths in Courts of Justice, and, indeed, in all matters of business.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.—The Hurkaru has followed up our observations on the Education of the Western Provinces with a comment, to which we now offer a brief rejoinder. Our notion of the failure of the system pursued by the Education Board in the Western Provinces, was derived, in some measure, from information which we received from independent and highly credible sources, but more particularly from the Report of the Committee: and we think our contemporary, if he will reconsider the concessions made in that Report, will feel disposed to come round to our opinion.

The case, therefore, stands thus: The Board patronizes the communication of superior knowledge to the Natives, exclusively through the medium of English. This peculiar mode of education is less appreciated in the Western, than in the Lower Provinces. In fact it may be said to be scarcely appreciated at all. The benches in its Western Seminaries are comparatively empty. This has led the Committee to avow the determination to relinquish the attempt to give English education, where its benefits are so little felt. We consider this a wise and very economical resolution. We are not required, at the call of benevolence, to cast "our pearls before swine." But as the Committee have no conception of imparting knowledge, save through the medium of a foreign language, and are not prepared to adopt the mother tongue of the people, this resolution is tantamount to cutting off the whole of the Western Provinces, namely, one-third of the subjects of the Crown in India, from all participation in those efforts which are made by the State to elevate the country. This circumstance naturally brings up the enquiry, whether it would not be better to establish a separate agency for the education of the Western Provinces, free from that bias in favour of an exclusively English education, with which the Calcutta Committee is, unfortunately, fettered, than to abandon some thirty or forty millions of people to ignorance.

But the expediency of establishing a separate and independent agency for the intellectual regeneration of the Western Provinces, rests upon higher grounds than the failure of the present scheme, and would have been equally valid if that scheme had completely succeeded. We merely propose the same independent arrangement for the West, which has so long and so beneficially been in operation at Madras and Bombay. Every man would feel the anomaly, if not absurdity, of any plan for subjecting the educational plans of those Presidencies to the control of the General Committee in Calcutta; and we have only to view the question with impartiality to discover the impropriety of perpetuating such a subordination, in reference to the Western Provinces. The population at both the minor Presidencies does not equal one-half the population of the districts comprised in the fourth Presidency. The habits, and the language of the people in the West, are as dissimilar from those of Bengal, as are the habits and speech of the people in the Mahatta, Telinga or Carnatic districts. The distance of the majority of the stations in Upper Hindoostan is of itself sufficient to point out the propriety of a local and separate scheme of superintendence; for the authority of the Calcutta Board above Allahabad must be merely nominal. We ask, therefore, for the Western Provinces, the same advantages of a distinct and independent economy, which is enjoyed by Bombay and Madras; and without which, the education of the Natives under those Presidencies would be an idle farce.

It may be said that the case is different with regard to the Western Provinces; that they have but recently been separated from the Bengal Provinces, with which for many years they were identified, by the enjoyment of common tribunals, both local and judicial, in all cases of appeal; and that the intercourse between them is far more regular and uninterrupted, than that between Calcutta and the other Presidencies. But what stronger argument than this can be adduced for the plan we are advocating? The inconvenience to the people of combining interests so vast, embracing a territory so extensive, under one management, was felt to be so glaring and anomalous, that even before the erection of Agra into a separate Presidency, Lord William Bentinck found it necessary, as a matter of justice, to establish a separate Board of Revenue, and a distinct Supreme Native Court of Appeal, in all matters civil and criminal, in the Western Provinces. If education had been deemed of as much importance, as the collection of the revenue, or the settlement of civil rights, or the prevention of crime, a corresponding arrangement would have been made for giving to the Western Provinces the benefit of an independent and national system of education. The fear of the Harka- ra, regarding the absorption of all the funds by the fourth Presidency, are groundless. Bombay and Madras are independent of the General Committee of Public Instruction, and yet subordinate to the Supreme Government. And why should not the Agra Presidency be placed upon the same footing, without transgressing the limits of expenditure, judiciously allotted to it by the Governor General; who, in sanctioning the educational expenditure of the two sister Presidencies, is not supposed to be under any necessity of consulting the Calcutta Board.

After these remarks were in type, we learnt with much pleasure that the Governor General had sanctioned a donation of Three Hundred Rupees a month, from the public funds, to the Agra School Book Society.

MISSIONARY CHURCHES.—Several weeks ago we promised to lay before our readers, the foreign part of the missionary system of the Scottish Secession Church. And it may be explained in a few words. The Missionaries of the Secession Synod abroad form themselves, as soon as their numbers in any one country will admit of the combination, into a Presbytery; and then proceed to exercise all the functions which are considered proper to such a body—and they are all that are requisite for the effective propagation of the gospel, and its naturalization in a new country. Two Foreign Presbyteries have been formed, the one in Canada, and the other in Jamaica. The members of the Canada Presbytery appear to be wholly Missionaries of the Secession Synod; but the Jamaica Presbytery comprises also the Missionaries of the Scotch Missionary Society. Upon these bodies, even when thus liberally constituted, is devolved the whole direction of the missions. To them is left the ascertaining of the spiritual wants and claims of the different localities within their province. In doing, if not all, cases, they decide what station is to be occupied by each new Missionary that arrives. They direct the application of local contributions; and take charge of the candidates for the ministry who present themselves in the congregations under their care, direct their theological education, and eventually introduce them to the service of the gospel.

By this arrangement many evils are avoided. The Synods, by generously relinquishing what might be considered their prerogative of control, escape the mistakes and misgivings so naturally incident to men, who have the direction of things of which they are necessarily very ignorant. On the other hand, the Missionaries are free from the mortification of having their experience and information rendered wholly useless by the ignorance, caprice or jealousy of home interference. And at the same time the evils of misjudging rashness, and of imprudence or inconsistency of whatever kind in any Missionary, are met on the spot, and with the greatest promptitude, by the jurisdiction of the Missionary Presbytery.

The minutes of the meeting of the Jamaica Presbytery in January, 1838, are before us; and we shall note the principal points recorded in them, in order to show the practical working of the system. The Presbytery began its proceedings, as usual, with religious services, in which a sermon was preached by the Rev. George Rhyll, from Rev. ii. 10, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." At the first meeting for actual business, a Committee was appointed to prepare for publication at home, a succinct account of the Mission, containing the particulars of its past history, the present aspect of its operations, arising out of recent occurrences, and the bearing of the peculiar circumstances of the country on missionary efforts. The treasurer of the Presbytery found then made his report, and received the collections brought in by the members of Presbytery. It was agreed that the funds should be chiefly appropriated to support Catechists in new stations; and the members engaged to increase the collections in their congregations, and to apply for aid otherwise in the country, so as to provide the means for maintaining one or more Catechists in separate and destitute districts of the Island. Nine Stations were reported as open for the labours of Missionaries and Catechists, and of much importance.

At the next Sederunt it was agreed, that a Catechist, Mr. Aird, and his wife, being immediately expected in the country, should be settled in Manchester parish; and that as soon as another arrives, he be recommended to Green Island, if it be not previously supplied. A Committee was appointed to inquire particularly concerning the new stations mentioned before, and to use means to obtain a supply of Missionaries or Catechists for them. It was agreed that heartfelt gratitude be expressed to the Secession Synod for so promptly responding to the call to send Catechists to labour with the Presbytery, and that their continued aid be requested to meet the numerous and important applications for Christian instruction in destitute districts of the Island. A letter was read from the Rev. J. Vine, relative to a union of the Presbyterian and Independent Churches in Jamaica; and a Committee were instructed, in reply, to express the Presbytery's desire to have a cordial co-operation, though a perfect union did not seem at present practicable. A Deputation were appointed to convey the reply to the approaching meeting of the Missionaries of the London Society, and express the fraternal regards of the Presbytery. It was agreed to recommend to the Synod to make as liberal a grant as possible to Mr. Paterson, for the erection of a place of worship at Cocoa Walk, leaving him to communicate to the Committee of the Synod, the circumstances of the case.

At another Sederunt, the Rev. Mr. Slater, of the London Missionary Society, was introduced, and requested to offer his sentiments on any subject that might come before the meeting. In consequence of the errors in doctrine and practice prevailing in Jamaica, relative to baptism, (those heretics, the Baptists, are very numerous and successful there,) the members of Presbytery were urged to carefulness in instructing their flocks on the nature and meaning of the ordinance, and to be cautious in admitting persons to it. Mr. Waddell was desired to prepare a short tract on the subject, of which an impression of 5000 copies should be got from home, to be shared between the Presbytery and the Independent Missionaries. The same member was desired to prepare a manual of instruction for the direction and use of Catechists and Teachers in the congregations of the Presbytery. Exercises were prescribed and received from two candidates for the ministry.

At the seventh Sederunt a proposal was communicated from a lady, to bequeath her house and a considerable quantity of land to the Presbytery, with the request that they would determine to what particular purpose the property could be devoted with most advantage to the Mission, and to name trustees; and a Committee was appointed for the settlement of the business. Afterwards, reports of the different Missionary Churches and stations were given in, which were all deemed of a highly satisfactory and important character. Another recommendation was agreed on to the Synod for assistance in the erection of a new place of worship. The annual distribution of the Presbytery fund was made; and it was agreed to establish a fund to aid in the maintenance of the widows and orphans of the ministers of the Presbytery, to originate which, every member should, in the current year, pay in the sum of £20 currency.

The advantages of a system like this must be manifest to every reflecting person. It furishes the Missionary with those sources of encouragement, which ministers at home enjoy in association with their brethren, and the want of which abroad has been generally felt and complained of. Instead of feeling that in his difficulties and perplexities, his joys and sorrows, he must wait the tedious length of communications to and fro, across the globe, before he can receive counsel or sympathy—that his tale may fall unheeded to the ground, when at last it reaches his friends, too much engrossed by immediate objects of their own to attend to him—or that their answer, when it comes, may be as unsuitable to his circumstances, which in the meantime may have wholly changed, as the lamentations of mourners to the mirth of a feast—he knows that he has a present resource in those who are experienced in trials like his own, and naturally reckon his success theirs, and his difficulties theirs. His intercourse with them has all the sweetness of personal attachment; and in addition it has the stability of acknowledged relationship, and the edification that arises from a consciousness of possessing the power to be mutually helpful. In such a body as the Presbytery there is little scope for favouritism. The Synod at home does not receive the recommendations of individuals, but of their affiliated body, the Presbytery; and with them every matter is subjected to open discussion, and every member is on an equality with the rest.

The scheme of the Presbytery also gives to their Missionary undertaking the character of enterprise and progression. With them it is a constant inquiry, what more can be done than is done. They are not afraid of being thought officious and meddlesome for urging an extension of their work, or of being suspected of an expensive taste, or vainglorious assumption, in calling for larger pecuniary means, or of being reproved for their inconsistency in adding to the burdens of their already over-burdened supporters. Personalities are lost in their associated capacity. And when they enquire what more can be done, they take into consideration means as well as work. Local resources are before them, as what they are bound to develop, and have the right to appropriate as they see fit. If they create new burdens, they put their own shoulders to them, and, consequently, are free from reproach from others.

Whilst the Missionaries are thus occupied, their people perceive they have before their eyes, an enterprise recommended to them by every principle of Christian affection, in which their help is needed, and their own happiness is involved. They, too, embark in it. They sustain the efforts of their ministers. Their prayers, their conversation, their life—all become imbued with the generous warmth, and holy consecration of men, who look not every one on his own things, but every man also on the things of others, and so have in them the mind which was also in Christ Jesus.

WEEKLY EDITOR OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 29.

Late last night intelligence was received of the fall of Ghazni, on the morning of the 23d of July last. The total number of killed was 17; of wounded, 1849. No officer was killed, but fifteen were wounded. Sir John Keane, after establishing a garrison and a hospital in this fortress, intended to push on towards Kabul.—The Governor General received his dispatches by the June Mail, on the 6th of August. The letters were only one month and twenty-two days between London and the Hindustan.—The Bombay Government has just drawn five lakhs of Rupees on the Government of Calcutta. It is reported that further sums will be drawn at so distant period.—The Bombay Times, of the 14th of August, affirms that the official orders of the Court of Directors, touching the Proprietary India Company's shares in the Chartered Bank are to be transferred, and positively and bona fide arrive by the last Overland Mail, in the Teutonic, on the 27th July.—The Englishman having, in a late number, stated that the Bombay papers were in the habit of suppressing all information regarding the Comprehensive Scheme, the Bombay Gazette has replied to our contemporary; and in the course of his reply, uses the following utterance, which is a very correct representation of the feeling which prevails at Bombay, on the subject; "when our own wants are supplied, it is not necessary that we should suffer much, or be in want for the wants of others;" a most unqualified assertion. The misfortune is, that the Court of Directors are of the same mode of thinking.—Mr. Braiken has authorized a contradiction of the report that he intended to stand for the Secretaryship of the Union Bank. He will not interfere with the views of his friend, Mr. Gordon.—The Zeebon has returned from her first trip to sea. She is described as "an excellent sea boat, not particularly quick, but easy at sea, well put together, and fit for all work."—The Madras Government has just notified that the second and final distribution of the Prize-Money acquired by the capture of Bourbon, in 1810, twenty-five years ago, is about to be paid.—There is a rumour that there has been a skirmish with Doet Mahomed's troops; that he has been defeated and fled.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 30.

The Ocean Glendower, a fine new ship of a thousand tons burden, has just reached Madras, after having made the voyage from England in the amazingly brief period of eighty-three days.—The Englishman gives information that the Shah arrived at Kila Knaer, ten miles from Kabul, on the 3d August, and was to enter the city on the 5th. Doet Mahomed is said to have fled towards Bamian, with only four pieces of artillery and six or seven hundred of his immediate followers, leaving his guns and stores behind him.—The number of letters and packets despatched from Calcutta to Bombay, for transmission by the mail, exceeded that of all former mails, and amounted to five thousand one hundred and fifty-nine. "This circumstance can scarcely fail to convince those who are not wilfully blind, that if a Steamer were to start monthly from our own port, the postage of letters would go no small way to pay the expenses of the enterprise. As it is, the more we avail ourselves of the Mail now, the more does the probability of disappointment increase. The present Mail, from its extra weight, will probably reach Bombay the day after the Steamer has sailed.—Another batch of what is called Optim Scrip has been brought forward, in order, if possible, to obtain for it a local habitation and a name, among the stock of this Presidency. It is said to have sold at a higher price than on a former occasion. It has fetched 400 Rs. the Chest in Calcutta!! It was offered at Singapore; there no one would give more than ten dollars for it.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 31.

The Englishman states, that letters from Benares affirm that the Governor General's Agent has intercepted numerous letters from Nepal, which plainly show the state of feeling which exists in the Nepalese Court. It is probable that Sir Henry Fane, before his departure for England, will proceed to Hyderabad, in the Deccan, to inspect and report on the condition of the Nizam's forces.—Letters from Aracan state, that the Burmese troops had proceeded to Thonouah, on the Aungmye route, and were erecting stockades, and fortifying themselves; and that forces were assembling to large numbers. It is, therefore, surmised, that they will seize upon the passes which lead from Aracan into the vale of the Irrawaddy, through which a portion of the British army would enter the Burmese territories, in case of a war between the two countries.—News from Seinde is of a peculiar character. It is stated that Saheb Khan, the chief of that hilly country, lying between Kachhee, Sonmura and Sehevan, had come into the British camp, and produced a letter, signed by the Ameer, after they had concluded an arrangement with Sir John Keane, directing him to annoy the British troops in every way, to make attacks on the camp by fire, to plunder their baggage, and to murder every man or officer who fell in his way.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 2.

Intelligence has been received from the Persian Gulf, that Mr. Farrar, the British Consul, went to Mohammar, in the High Lindsay Steamer, to demand the coal which had been deposited there. The Persian Governor refused to give it up; and as the Persians have hitherto a notion that Steamers cannot fire, he said we might resort to force. The evening gun of the Steamer was fired, so as to make a particularly loud noise, and the next morning the coal was given up.—The Calcutta government calling on the Government to purchase the Atalagpacar Steamer, which lately plied between that Island and the Mauritius; we believe the Bengal Government is before hand in the market.—Dr. Ranken, the Agent for Post Office enquiries, has published a notice, that the Governor General has directed the establishment of a post through the Punjab, and the Khyber Pass to Peshawar, Cabool, Candahar, Herat, and other places.—The rumour is revived, that twelve additional regiments are to be raised. It is far more likely that the strength of the existing regiments will be augmented, by the addition of officers.—The Bombay Times states, that the inequality of the new Steamer, the Zeebon, to go against the Monsoon, has been fully proved by the last trip, in which, in moderate weather, she shipped an immense quantity of water.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.

A Delhi Gazette Extraordinary states, on Native reports, that the British force advancing from Ghilane, was met at Quilla Quasree, by Doet Mahomed Khan, and his army, with his two sons; that an engagement ensued, in which one of the sons was killed, and the enemy entirely defeated; that after a great slaughter of the Affghans, Doet Mahomed abandoned his guns and baggage, and fled into Turkistan; that the battle took place on the 1st and 2d of August, and that Cabool was occupied on the 4th. This intelligence is a most confirmed rumour, but it is very likely, from the position of affairs, to be substantially true.—At the sale of the freight by the Steamer this day, the demand being for eighteen thousand feet, the supply eight hundred, the bidings were very spirited; and many feet were sold at the enormous rate of six Rupees a foot, equal to between thirty and forty pounds sterling a ton.—The papers announce the death, at Burrial, of Mr. Dattal, the oldest Indigo Planter in Bengal, at the advanced age of seventy-seven.—Mr. Babington, the Post Master at Simsbulpore, has addressed the public journals of this Presidency, and denied the statement made by the Bombay Editors, that the delay in the movements of the post, takes place on the Bengal side.—Appa Sahib, the Chief of Nipance, under the Bombay Presidency, has just died; and thus his estates, which yield five lakhs of Rupees a year, have lapsed to the British Government. He was some years ago convicted, by the Political Agent of Dharwar, of counterfeiting the birth of a son, and murdering the child's real mother. He was, therefore, declared by Government incapable of adopting a son.

Temporary Office, Guildhall Coffee-house, King-street, Cheapside, London.

It is admitted in Great Britain, and known to be but too true by all who have had personal experience of the real state of India, that although a commercial intercourse has existed between the British Isles and India, for more than two hundred years, and the Government of this Empire now rules over a hundred millions of the inhabitants of the East, there is, nevertheless, a general want of information upon Indian affairs, and an almost total indifference felt respecting them. It must be obvious also who reflect upon these facts, that such a state of things contrasts strangely with the duty we owe to our distant dominions, with the extent, the value, and the importance of our East Indian Possessions, and with the many and vast interests involved in the question.

British India is an Empire as large as Europe, (exclusive of Russia), with a population, including Tributary States, of more than one hundred and fifty millions. Over this Empire and People, a sway is exercised wholly British; and, consequently, the want of an accurate knowledge of Indian affairs, and the absence of a proper interest in the public at large for the welfare of the Natives, must operate prejudicially upon their minds, since they cannot but feel that their destinies are influenced by the disposition manifested towards them in the parent country.

From the perusal of a variety of official, and other documents, of recent date, it appears that ignorance, poverty, crime, and affliction, prevail to a distressing and alarming extent throughout the British Indian territories. It also appears, that during the last twenty years, though a period of profound peace, there has been a consumption of human life of the most disgusting description.

It has been estimated that the famine of 1837-38, in the Upper Provinces of Bengal, swept off more than half a million of the inhabitants. Famines are this year ravaging the Northern Provinces of Bombay and Madras. These calamitous events are rendered the more mysterious and affecting, when viewed in connection with the statement, that the soil of India is a soil of unequalled fertility, and that a very large portion of it (by some authorities, computed at one-half) lies uncultivated, and covered with jungle, the haunt of wild beasts.

Information on these subjects, has, within the last few months, been held before the public in various parts of the kingdom. The result has been, a deep feeling of compassion in the minds of many humane and influential persons, and the formation of Associations for promoting the welfare of the Natives of India, in Sheffield, Glasgow, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Edinburgh, Darlington, &c. A strong feeling has, besides, been expressed for the establishment of a Metropolitan Society for the same object; by whose inquiries and efforts, the friends of India, throughout Great Britain, might be guided and assisted in this new and benevolent undertaking.

In consequence of these circumstances, and in accordance also with their own deep feeling of interest in the subject, the individuals whose names are attached to this Prospectus, have, after mature deliberation, resolved themselves into a Provisional Committee, for forming a Society, to be designated the "BRITISH INDIA SOCIETY, for bettering the condition of our fellow subjects the Natives of British India."

In making known this resolution to the public, the Committee assign it their duty to state very briefly, but distinctly, their aims and plans.

The Committee has its origin in a regard for the welfare of the Natives of India, who, owing allegiance to the Government, are entitled to look for sympathy and succour from the people of England. The Committee desire to found the proposed Society upon the strictest principles of justice and humanity—upon a basis which will permanently exclude the adoption of party, of sectarian, or mercenary views. They contemplate the use of those means only which are moral, peaceful and constitutional. They would suggest, and labour to rectify, the decay of all specific plans of amelioration, until every doubt respecting the nature and extent of alleged existing evils, and the necessity of remedying them, is entirely removed.

The primary duty of a BRITISH INDIA SOCIETY would, therefore, be—to obtain from every available source authentic and impartial information respecting the present actual condition of the Natives of India, and the circumstances of the country, and to give to the information so obtained, the widest possible circulation. The means of accomplishing this necessary preliminary object appear to be, viz. :—

To bring together, analyse, condense, and diffuse, the facts already at hand.

To adopt the best means of obtaining regular and systematic information from all parts of India.

To begin a collection of the most useful works on every branch of the subject.

To issue, under proper management, a Periodical Publication, containing the most recent, important, and interesting Indian intelligence.

To reprint, in whole or in part, such works as may be calculated to elucidate particular portions of the great subject.

To employ an active, experienced, and effective Agency, for the organization of Provincial Auxiliary Societies.

The judicious and zealous prosecution of a course, such as has been now described, would, the Committee feel assured, effectually remove the apathy which at present exists. That apathy, they believe, may, with justice, be ascribed to the difficulty which has hitherto attended the search after correct and comprehensive information, respecting the condition and character of the Natives of India, and the nature and effects of British rule in the East.

The Committee entertain no doubt, that, when the vast importance of our possessions is understood—when the claims of one hundred millions of British subjects are recognised and felt—and when the responsibility and moral obligation of the nation towards them are considered, a great and generous effort will promptly be made to benefit a country, which contains within itself, the means of returning a hundred-fold into the bosoms of its benefactors, all the blessings they can possibly confer upon it.

The Committee prefer to make their appeal to the just principles and Christian feelings of the country. They are not ignorant, however, of the extent to which they might address themselves to the loyalty, the patriotism, and the interests of their fellow citizens, but they believe that such an appeal is unnecessary. They feel convinced that no argument is required, to demonstrate the inseparable connexion, between the bettering of the social, moral, and intellectual condition of the countless millions of India, and the accomplishment of those ends which are sought by the promoters and patrons of legitimate commerce, and the advocates of the honour, the stability, and the prosperity of the British Empire, at home and abroad.

The Committee having stated the objects, principles, and plans, according to which they are about to attempt the formation of a BRITISH INDIA SOCIETY, look with confidence for the sanction, support, and co-operation of the British public. They sincerely and earnestly solicit advice. They especially desire the aid of gentlemen who have resided in India, and who, after perusing this Prospectus, feel that they can cordially unite in the work proposed.

Finally, the Committee respectfully solicit pecuniary assistance. Subscriptions and donations will be gratefully received by the Treasurer, Secretaries, Bankers and Members of the Committee, May 25th, 1839.

* * * It is the intention of the Provisional Committee to give due notice of the public formation of the proposed Society, and to invite the presence and aid, on the occasion, of those friends, in different parts of the kingdom, who may have already espoused the cause, or who may be desirous of doing so.

P. S. Since the First Edition of this Prospectus was issued, the Committee have received, from various parts of the country, the most encouraging assurances of sympathy and support. The Committee have been peculiarly gratified by the Resolution passed at the Annual Meeting of the Relief Synod of Scotland, on the 14th instant, recognising the great importance of the object the Committee have in view, and pledging the co-operation of that respectable and influential body. The friends of humanity will rejoice to find that Thomas Clarkson, Esq., the venerable and enlightened friend of African freedom, has heartily united with those who are associated in this effort for the improvement of the condition of their fellow subjects, the Natives of British India.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I perceive you have noticed the question of oaths in your leading article of the 1st instant. You appear to think that the poorer Hindoos are obliged to swear by the Ganges-jul, Tulsees and Copper, &c. This, however, is not the case; for by Clause 6, Sec. 23, Reg. VIII. of 1803, these oaths cannot be compulsorily administered to Hindu witnesses in any of our Courts; and if the witnesses object to them, the administering officer is required to administer any other suitable form of oath instead of them. And a case occurred a few months ago, in which a respectable Hindu, summoned as a witness in a Civil Suit, refused to take the Ganges-jul, and offered to pay the Plaintiff's demand on the Defendant, (2,000 Rs.) that a raseenamah might be given into Court, so as to avoid the necessity of swearing by it, which a Native Judge, who presided over the Court, thought it incumbent on him to administer, or to fine and imprison this contumacious witness! On his refusing to allow the compromise of the suit he proposed to the witness to take the Hindu solemn declaration of Sec. 7, Reg. III. of 1803; and he refused this, as being objected to the compound Brahmin-killing clause attached to it!! Sec. 7, Reg. IV. of 1794, gives the same declaration, without this obnoxious clause; and this he consented to take—at least so his relatives told me. Almost civilians, indeed all, with one exception, to whom I have shown the Regulations on the subject, agree in comidering a Judge, or any oath administering Officer, legally authorized to administer the solemn declarations as oaths, and so worded, if he could make them most binding, and most likely to elicit truth; so that in fact the question, as to the existing legality, is settled. And now care should be taken that no order issues legalizing them. And if any issue at all, it should only be to make the legality of those substituted forms more generally known. The objection of the one Civilian I above allude to, was, not that it was not legal, but that it would be better if the superior Courts gave it out to be so understood, so as to remove doubts which the dustoor of the use of the older oaths might occasion in some minds. Government has, on one occasion, admitted this principle, that administering officers shall administer to witnesses oaths most binding on consciences, and not any one form in particular. A Civilian once applied to know, if he might swear a witness on his son's head; and the answer was, that his oath was objectionable, as it was only temporal in its consequences; it only denounced war on the son during his life; and did not extend to his future son as well. Thus the principle of selecting oaths is allowed; and it is only by this view necessary, that the oath generally shall affect the present and future of the swearer; and this principle is attained in the solemn declaration of oaths. That the Heathen can swear these oaths knowingly and conscientiously, we may take St. Paul for authority; where, in the 1st and 2nd Chapters of his Epistle to the Romans, he declares that they are judged, and condemnable, for never having acquired right knowledge of God, and neglecting to follow it up, so as to arrive at the full truth.

It appears to me, then, very desirable to adopt these oaths, as encouraging and reviving the slumbering knowledge and fear of God among the Heathen; and who shall say that thereby this incipient and revived fear of God, shall not be to them the "Beginning of Wisdom" for does not Scripture say, "And he that sweareth in the earth shall swear by the God of truth, Isaiah 65, 6." And again, "And it shall come to pass, if they, the Heathen, will diligently learn the ways of my people, to swear by my name, the Lord liveth—as they taught my people to swear by Baal, they shall be built in the midst of my people." With you I had rather have no oaths at all; but oaths seem to have a divine sanction attached to them; for the Hebrews were required to use them in disputes between each other. Of the benefit of the substitution of the solemn declarations as oaths, I am daily more satisfied; and the fear and reverence with which they are taken, promises greatly to ensure a blessing on our administration of justice; and it is my belief on the people themselves.

Yours faithfully,
T.

P. S. If you wish to know how the first Christians acted in this oath matter, read Gibbons's Rome, 13th Chapter of his First Volume: he coincides with me in their refusing to swear or administer them.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—You ask whether I think the fear of false swearing is connected solely with the idolatrous symbol which is generally used; or, would the adjuration by the name of God, without the addition either of an idol's name, or an idolatrous symbol, be equally binding on the Hindoos?

I do certainly think the idolatrous symbol has considerable influence with the majority of Hindoo witnesses. But I also think that that influence is materially increased by the ceremonial of administering an oath.

It is my impression, that nine out of ten Christian witnesses in England, are as much awed by the ceremony of swearing on the Bible, as by any other impulse; and that the simple adjuration by the name of God would not be more efficacious with them than with Hindoos.

You appear to have understood, that I think truth is only occasionally elicited by the administration of oaths. I think that it is so in the majority of instances. I believe the object would be more generally attained, if the presiding authorities had a wider discretion; because, as it would be less solemn, the ceremony would be more imposing.

Yours truly,
J. K. E.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I have just met with another difficulty in the administering an oath, which as you take an interest in the subject, I will relate to you. A witness of the Mehtar caste desired to be sworn upon the Koran, as he stated he was a Mussoulman, and a true believer. I directed the Mussoul Koranas to swear him upon the book, as is the invariable custom. He objected to do so, upon the plea that the book would be polluted by the touch of a sweeper, which was the witness's profession and occupation. My Mussoulman Amiah, and all the faithful Meektears in Court, supported the Mussoul's views, with much zeal and piety; so did the Mahomedan Law Officer, upon an official reference having been made to him. Sale and Pocock both affirm, that the Koran requires ablution before coming in contact with it; but there is nothing mentioned about low caste people being forbidden to handle the volume. This sweeper was an eye witness, and his testimony indispensable; but as I persisted in refusing to take his evidence, excepting upon oath; and that it should be administered in the customary manner, the followers of the Prophet gradually came round to my way of thinking, and the Koran was tendered to, and taken, by him. My reasons for being thus resolved, were a firm conviction that amongst the generality of Mussoulman witnesses, the binding and solemn importance of an oath, if it be so at all, is connected with the actual touch of the book which is to them of singularly sacred influence and efficacy, similar to the views and custom of the lower orders of Irish Roman Catholics, who, are informed, do not regard false declarations uttered upon the Bible, as false swearing, provided they  kiss their thumbs, and guard against their lips coming in contact with the book held in their hands.

I agree with your Correspondent, J. K. E., that an oath will sometimes elicit the truth. I have known witnesses depose more clearly and fully in my Court upon oath, than they had previously done at the Tiannah, where their testimony is taken without swearing. Perjury, however, is fearfully common, and the difficulty of legal proof and conviction so great, that it is daily practised; and that too, professionally, with impunity. If a false affirmation was made liable to the same penalty as a false and unfounded complaint, I think that we should more frequently be able to elicit the truth, without a continual profanation, or the fear of giving offence to the religious feelings of any of the Native community. How is it that oath-taking was originally ordered by our Government? If the ceremony be contrary to the principles of Hindooism, which it clearly is; and to this degree, that I have known educated witnesses object to sign an "Indemnity," with the impression upon their minds, that it was the form of an oath; and, therefore, forbidden them, though they made no objection to simply stating all they knew in the "yes and nay" manner. J. K. E. truly says, "It is a difficult thing to define what is respectability. It may mean in England the keeping a gig." In this country I explain the meaning of respectable people to be, "they who object to attend themselves in Court to conduct their cases in person, but who employ agents for this purpose, and are privy to, and wink at perjury and subornation of perjury, on the part of their witnesses to further their own interests in a case, well knowing that we are wont to place full value upon testimony given upon oath. J. K. E.'s fainting illustration of the value of an oath in eliciting the truth, is the exception to the general tendency; but he does not tell us, after all, whether his susceptible witness did state the truth. His instance merely proves that the lie which his deponent wished to state, was of that prodigious and unutterable description, that it stuck in his throat, may be from physical causes, and that even he staggered under it! Still I do not deny, that upon particular occasions, an oath may be the means of drawing out a true statement, though generally it has not this desired effect, and only deters the better description of witnesses from appearing in Court to give their testimony. One step, and that of a very important kind, has already been taken towards checking falsehood. The Sudder Nizamut have ruled, "that wilful perjury and contradiction is an offence, punishable as contempt of Court, vide Construction, No. 1177, of 1898." A close examination into a witness's evidence, easily proves its worth and veracity; and I have found this construction work well in putting down false witnesses.

Yours truly,
INDEX.

BIBLE PRINTING IN SCOTLAND.—Lord J. Russell* said, that the right hon. gentleman had correctly stated what he (Lord J. Russell) had said on a former occasion, which was, that it was not intended to give to any individual or corporation the exclusive right of printing the Bible with a view to profit, which would be the case with the Bible now printed in Scotland. The right hon. gentleman was, he thought, perfectly justified in asking him what were the precautionary measures which the Government proposed to take, in order to insure the correctness of the copies which would be printed after the patent had expired. What was proposed was, that the Crown should by charter appoint a certain number of persons, say five, who should have the right of printing the Bible in Scotland. One of these five persons should be the Moderator of the Church of Scotland, two others should be divines of the Church of Scotland, and the remaining two should be laymen, but members of the Scottish Church. If a larger number (say five persons) should be incorporated, the board would still be the same, and the printer would be appointed by the board should be granted the exclusive right of printing the Bible in Scotland, under certain conditions. One of these conditions would be the free importation of copies of the authorized version of the Bible in England. The board would have the power to give their imprimatur to any person applying to them for that privilege, and to refuse it to any person who was known to be a corruptor or person applied by the board, who would be able to say whether they were correct copies of the authorized version. With this limitation, it was proposed that there should generally be no restriction in regard to any publishers. In case of any private person desiring to publish a new edition of the Bible, it would be competent to the board to consent to the publication, or to refuse it, on account of fraudulent publications. The right hon. gent. had a keen him whether it was proposed to proceed by statute in the course of the present session in order to carry these measures into effect. Up to this point he had not only un-solicited his learned friend, the Lord Advocate, but also the Attorney-General, and they were of opinion that the Crown had full power and authority to make all provisions necessary for the purpose. The right hon. gent. would therefore understand that it was not intended to propose a bill, and that the opinion entertained at present was, that the authority of the Crown was sufficient. If the right hon. gent. required it, he would be glad to state the reasons for the opinion which he had justly required; but the general course of the plan was such as he had stated it, in order not to enhance the price.—Fat

SOCIETY IN AID OF FOREIGN MISSIONARIES IN LONDON.—

The Society seems to have been formed in a private manner in the beginning of the present year. Its object is to take by the hand Missionaries who have been trained up on the Continent, in Institutions conducted upon strictly evangelical principles, to provide for their hospitable entertainment in London, and to secure them the means of subsistence, and to procure for them, if requisite, engagements from the different Missionary Societies in England, and from others, and to afford them every possible facility on their embarking for their destinations. A public meeting of the friends of the Society was held, in conjunction with the Missionary Prayer Meeting, at the Rev. C. Morley's, on the 10th inst., for the purpose of ascertaining the object of which was to receive six German Missionaries, who had lately arrived in London on their way to India.

A Report was read by S. Jackson, Esq., the Treasurer of the Society, which detailed the length and the circumstances connected with its origin. "Towards the commencement of the year, 1836, the Rev. Dr. Lang, senior of the Presbyterian church in the Australian Colonies, being desirous of originating a mission to the aborigines of New Holland, came over to this country to obtain the requisite number of missionaries for carrying that philanthropically object into effect. Finding it impossible to procure them in England or Scotland, he proceeded to Germany, without being able to effect his purpose. He was on the point of taking passage to America. At that very period a gentleman, now a member of the committee, was written to by the Rev. Johannes Gossner, of Berlin, who had at that time twelve young men under preparation for the missionary work, intending to procure one as a convert for them. He informed Dr. Lang of the circumstance, who immediately wrote to the Rev. Dr. Lang, and he accepted the offer. Last year, the Rev. W. Smart, who spent a considerable time as a missionary in India, arrived also in England on a similar errand; and after applying in vain to other seminaries on the continent, proceeded to Berlin. He there procured twelve or thirteen. He subsequently hired a vessel for their his own expense, and they had arrived in India six Hall and Liverpool. Somewhat prior to that, four missionaries sent out by the Basle Society came over in London on their way to India. Other foreign missionaries, either proceeding to or returning from their various stations abroad, visited this metropolis on their way; and the want of some Society to take them by the hand and provide for them during their stay in London was increasingly felt. We perceived, that the English language, which was almost indispensable for those who went forth in English dependencies in the East, pointed out the necessity of their more protracted stay in this country, to attain a knowledge of our language. To that was added the consideration of the comparative poverty of the continental Almsgiving Societies. Few were able to do more than the present. We perceived, that the missionary work of the Society of Friends, did not claim the same assistance as that of the kind. A century ago, when the first of the Moravian missionaries arrived in this metropolis, an association was formed upon exactly similar principles. Such a Society was more than ever demanded now, when the missionary spirit was so much alive upon the continent, where many more missionaries would be trained up to do the work, if engagements could be procured for them, and the missionaries, who were already engaged, could be assisted. Those who, trusting solely in the providence of God, were willing to forsake all, and enter upon the arduous field of missionary labour, if only the means were afforded them of reaching it. To show the satisfaction with which the formation of the Society had been hailed by missionary institutions in Germany, extracts were sent from letters received from the Rev. J. Gossner, the Rev. Mr. Wernke, the Rev. Mr. Riecke, the Rev. Mr. Gieseler, and the various missionary institutions on the continent, and concluded by an urgent appeal on behalf of the Society.

The Rev. Dr. Stunkopf addressed the Missionaries both in English and German; and the Missionaries sang the 148th Psalm in German; after which the Rev. Dr. Heusermann made the following interesting statement: "There is one point to which I am desirous of calling your attention. It has been referred to in my previous interesting Report, and I have already said even- tually, that there is one point to which the Rev. Gossner desired to be better known to the British public than he now is. I am happy in being able to state that I am intimately acquainted with him. About twenty years ago his name occurred frequently in the reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He had been a Roman Catholic Priest. He was brought out of the darkness of Romanism, and made acquainted with the Lord Jesus Christ, and he has since been a devoted and zealous Protestant Christian, and him crucified, with his fellow-men. He was engaged about that time in translating the New Testament into the German language, for circulation among Roman Catholics. He was encouraged in this labour by grants from the British and Foreign Bible Society. His bold declaration of the glad tidings of salvation brought upon him the persecution of his brethren of the same faith, and he was obliged to leave his native land, and he reached us in Petersburg, where I was then engaged in connection with Dr. Pattison. We thought it likely that if the subject were brought under the notice of the Emperor Alexander, he would authorise his coming to Russia, and preaching to his countrymen there. On application to the Emperor he promised him his protection, which he not only extended to him, but allowed him a handsome salary, and he was enabled to preach in the Russian Cathedral of St. Isaac, and to preach in one of the Russian Catholic chapels. Soon after this the Cathedral was opened to him. For two or three years he preached the Gospel in all its simplicity and purity, and vast numbers emerged from hear him, not only Germans, but Swedes, Finns, Russians, and many others who understood the German language. His work was with power. He is a man of faith and love, and his ministry manifested in his serene and cheerful countenance, and his meekness. He has pointed out, during the few years he preached at Petersburg, nearly 7000 persons were brought under concern about their precious and immortal souls. Of these 700, nearly 200 gave evidence of a saving change of heart; having continued afterwards to walk as becometh the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. This work, however, was not permitted to go forward. Satan, finding that the chief officers of the Government were not disposed to encourage him, excited political suspicion against Gossner. This having been communicated to the Emperor, he at last surrendered him to the hands of his enemies, and he was under the necessity of quitting Petersburg. Never can I forget the last time that I saw that holy and devoted servant of Jesus Christ. He was confined as a prisoner in his own hotel; the police watched every movement of his officers, and he was not permitted to see his countrymen in life, whether we should allow him to depart without coming to give to bid him farewell. Still occupying a public station in connection with the Russian Bible Society, I was afraid that I might endanger the great work we were carrying forward. At last he loved to this devoted land prevailed, and we went to bid him farewell. It was an affecting scene. The room was full of his converts. There were formerly 2000 persons, and now more than 10000. He was going to ship, and amidst a throng of his converts, and his friends, he said, "Bless God that we never saw him!" In the course of a few days he took his departure, and returned to Berlin. The King of Prussia afforded him protection, and permitted him to preach in the churches. There he is now, and is engaged not only in preaching the Gospel, but in educating devoted young men for missionary work. It was long before Goswami could be prevailed upon to assume the name of Protestant. He found as much enmity and other errors among Protestants, that he preferred to be called an apostolic catholic. He renounced the title Roman Catholic, and assumed the one I have stated. Since then, feeling as many kindred spirits among Protestants, he has adopted my name. I do trust that the apostolic made to you to-night will not be in vain. I can testify to the value of our young German Missionaries. I have known many of them, than whom I have never known more simple hearted, more entirely devoted Missionaries of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. These are the kind of men that we want. They are willing to go forth basking for nothing from the Gentiles, and requiring scarcely any thing for their support, provided they can be located among the heathen. Shall we not, then, help them onward after a godly sort, and thus become fellow-labourers in the truth?

The Rev. Dr. Patten likewise addressed the assembly; and one of the Missionaries spoke through an interpreter.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—At the anniversary of the West Riding of Yorkshire Auxiliary to this Society, held at Leeds last week, the sum of £1067 was raised, which is more than six times the average amount of the collections made at former anniversaries of that Auxiliary. The congregation of the Rev. T. D. Lorraine, at Wakefield, subscribed a special sum of 100*l.*; and amongst the contributions handed in were the following:—Wm. Standish, Esq., 50*l.*; O. Willans, Esq., 50*l.*; P. Willans, Esq., 50*l.*; John Peck, Chaplain, Esq., 50*l.* A resolution proposed by the Rev. J. Campbell, of the Yorkshire, London, pledging the meeting to take its full share of effort in raising the income of the London Missionary Society in one hundred thousand pounds per annum, was passed unanimously.—Pat.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Friday evening, the 14th June, a Valedictory Service was held at Finsbury Chapel, Moorfields, in order to commend to the Divine protection and blessing the Rev. W. H. Pearce, F. Tucker, T. Phillips, T. Morgan, and J. Wenger, who were to embark a few days after at Portsmouth, for Calcutta, on the Platagon. On the embarkation of these Brethren, nine of the ten additional Missionaries sought by Mr. Pearce, it has been stated, will have sailed for India.

READING.—The Rev. John Statham, of Amersham, Bucks, (formerly of Hawrah) has accepted the invitation of the Baptist Church, Kings-road, Reading, (after under the care of the Rev. J. H. Hinton), to become their pastor, and will (D. V.) enter on his duties the last Sabbath in June.—Ibid.

ROMAN CATHOLIC INCREASE.—That the Roman Catholics are on the increase among us, is undeniable. So is every Protestant denomination, with the exception of the Unitarians (out of the Establishment) and the Society of Friends. They must needs increase with the increase of the population, and especially with the constant influx of Irish Catholics intermarriages of nominal Protestants and Catholics in the lower classes, aided by the superior activity and zeal of the Roman clergy in gaining proselytes, have tended to promote this increase; and in the neighbourhood of Roman Catholic colleges and seminaries, conversions to Romanism are the result of local influence. But the question is, are the Romanists increasing beyond the proportion in which other denominations are multiplying their numbers? Are they gaining ground upon the Protestants in this country? From all we can learn, we should say decidedly, they are not. New and elegant structures are rising, dedicated to the Roman worship, and indicating the wealth of the Catholic gentry, aided, perhaps, by foreign resources. But are Romanist churches increasing in any proportion to Churches of England chapels, Wesleyan chapels, and dissenting chapels? Why in some of our principal towns, the Irvingites vie with the Papists in architectural enterprise and magnificence! The boastful exaggerations of the Catholics themselves have been too credulously received by Protestant bigots and alarmists.—Ibid.

FIVE ROMAN CATHOLIC MISSIONARIES left Lyons a few days ago for Paris, on their way to London, where they are to embark for Spynie, in New South Wales. They will afterwards join M. Poupallier, Bishop of Marone, and apostolic vicar of New Zealand, in the island of Hokitanga, where he has formed a prosperous religious establishment.—Galignani's Messenger.

EDUCATION.

The Education question is now likely to be set at rest, at least for some time to come. The ten thousand pounds which were granted by Parliament in 1835, for the establishment of Normal Schools, and which has remained ever since at the disposal of the Treasury, is at length to be given in equal proportions to the National Society and to the British and Foreign School Society. A fresh grant of 30,000*l.* is to be proposed on the 14th inst., and this sum, together with the remainder of the grant made by Parliament in 1837 and 1838, yet unappropriated, is to be applied as follows:—

First and chiefly as heretofore, in aid of voluntary subscriptions towards the erection of school-houses.

Secondly (in particular cases), in a partial support of schools connected with the two Societies.

Thirdly,—to the purposes of inspection, and in the means of acquiring a complete knowledge of the present state of Education in England and Wales.

Under the first of these heads, (grants towards the erection of school-houses,) a modification of the existing arrangement, in three particulars is suggested.

1. The rule hitherto adopted of making a grant to those places where the largest proportion is subscribed, not to be invariably adhered to, should application be made from very poor and populous districts, where subscriptions to a sufficient amount cannot be obtained.

2. The Committee not to feel themselves precluded from making grants in particular cases, which shall appear to them to call for the aid of Government, although the applications may not come from either of the two mentioned Societies.

3. No further grant to be made now or hereafter for the establishment or support of Normal Schools, or of any other schools, unless the right of inspection be retained, in order to secure conformity to the regulations and discipline established in the several schools, with such improvements as may from time to time be suggested to the Committee.

The establishment of any Normal Schools under the direction of the State, is given up. The Committee state, they have experienced so much difficulty in reconciling conflicting views respecting provisions for securing religious instruction without violating the rights of conscience, that "it is not in their power to venture a plan for the accomplishment of this design without first giving consideration to the objections, and making way step for this purpose, until greater concurrence of opinion is found to prevail."—Pat.

SCIENTIFIC.

ORGANIC REMAINS.—In excavating for the Great Western Railway a few days since, a remarkably fine tomb of the Mammoth was discovered lying on a bed of new red sandstone, about a foot below the surface, between the Great Western Works and St. Philip's bridge. The tomb, together with some very beautiful specimens of iron and lead ore, found near the same spot, have been kindly brought to the Philosophical Institution by Dr. Fairbairn, for the inspection of the members and their friends.—Cambridge.

VALPARAISO, FEB. 21.—A VOLCANIC ISLAND has just been formed between the 33rd and the 34th degrees of south latitude; between Valparaiso and the island of Juan Fernandez. This phenomenon excited great fears for ships coming from the north, because one island, which is six miles in extent, is precisely in the centre of vessels coming to our port. A Valparaiso letter of the 20th of February given by the Journal de la Mer, contains the following report from the captain of a British brig:—"On the morning of the 18th we felt several shocks of an earthquake. A dead calm prevailed at the time, and lasted through the day, the atmosphere being extremely close and hot. Towards evening a breeze got up, and we were able to move two leagues. At seven, we saw rising above the surface of the sea a rock, which, after attaining a certain height, divided into two parts, one inclining horizontally towards the north, the other seeming to be partly crushed by the shock, and becoming less elevated, but broader at the base. The two rocks, after being thus severed, continued to rise higher, and at the same time two other islets appeared near the first. The group ranged from south to north within a space of about nine miles, and about sixty leagues west of Valparaiso. In the night we observed flames similar to those of small volcanic eruptions issuing from the crevices of this new archipelago. The next day we were enabled to judge of the height of these new-formed mountains, and calculated the highest to be 400 feet above the surface. Two other ships have also seen this group, and a French cutter on this station has sailed to examine it, and to land some men on the islets, if possible."—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT BILL.—The operation of the new bill for the abolition of arrest may be traced from the following facts:—On the first day of the present Trinity Term there was not a single surrender in either the Queen's Bench or Fleet Prisons, nor a single prisoner charged in execution, nor has a solitary writ of Habeas Corpus issued; and up to the present day but four persons have been charged in execution—a circumstance which has never before occurred. In 1826 there were 90 surrenders in Queen's Bench in one day alone. The fact is, by being admitted to bail, as is the case under the present act of 1st and 2nd Victoria, the insolvents have an opportunity of seeing and arranging with their creditors, the opposition to a discharge has, in consequence, diminished one-half; and with it a distribution of the counsel's fees in the Insolvent Debtor's Court. One prisoner in No. 15 staircase of the Queen's Bench, has in whole of the room (nine in number) to himself.—Pat.

LADLOW.—The electors of Ladlow have returned Mr. Aleck, the Liberal candidate, by a majority of four, in spite of all the influence of the Clive family, the bribery of the Carletons, and the arts of the leading managers of their system of election. The numbers at the close of the poll were,—

For Mr. Aleck ..... 184
For Mr. Clive, ..... 180

A DEPUTATION FROM THE ABORIGINAL PROTECTION SOCIETY, consisting of Mr. Briscoe, M. P., Mr. Fowell Buxton, Mr. Bannister, and Mr. Moreing, had an interview with Mr. Labouchere, on Saturday, June 6th, on the subject of native evidence in courts of justice in the colonies. —Ibid.

DUNDEE.—By an order in Council, dated the 3rd instant, the port of Dundee is declared a fit and proper port for the importation of goods from places within the limits of the East India Company's charter. —Ibid.

SOUTHAMPTON RAILWAY.—Only 18 miles of the London and Southampton Railway will remain incomplete after this day, June 10th, when the line will be extended from Winchester to the immediate vicinity of Basingstoke, and from Southampton to Winchester. Arrangements have been made to complete the journey to London in five hours. —Ibid.

DUBLIN AND LIVERPOOL.—The following are the new Post-office arrangements:—The day mail from London on the 19th June will reach Liverpool at seven P.M., the same day, and the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company's mail packet will immediately leave for Dublin with the mails. The night mail leaving London will reach Liverpool at half-past six A.M., and the Government packet will leave at seven P.M. The morning packet, which now leaves Holyhead at seven A.M., will then come. But the evening packet, leaving Holyhead at seven P.M., will continue as at present. Then the mails from Dublin will be as follows:—The City of Dublin Company's mail packet is to leave at half-past five, and the Government packet will leave at half-past 11, both from Kingstown Harbour. The packet for Holyhead is to leave Kingstown at eight A.M., on the 19th instant, to return to Holyhead whenever practicable in time for the mail coach from thence to Harford, as at present. The Irish inland mails are to be despatched from the Post-office at nine at night. —Ibid.

MR. GEORGE STEPHENSON, civil engineer, of this town, stood publicly at the recent opening of the York and North-Midland Railway, with the truth and simplicity which mark his character, that he commenced his career in life as a plough-boy, and that he was sent off by his parents to labour when he was only eight years of age. —Newcastle Journal.

A MAN'S HEAD BLOWN OFF.—On Saturday last, an inquest was held on the body of a man, who was killed at one of the shafts belonging to the Manchester and Leeds railway, at Summit, near Kettlewell. It appeared that the deceased was looking down the shaft at the precise time they were blasting below, and his head was literally blown off. A verdict of Accidental Death was returned. —Hullfax Guardian.

REMOVING.—I have such horror of moving, that I would not take a benefactor from the King if I were not indulged with non-residence. What a dislocation of comfort is comprised in that word—moving! Such a heap of nasty little things after you think all is gone into the cart; odd dredging boxes, worn out brushes, old pipes, phials, things that it is impossible the most necessitous person can ever want; but which the women, who preside on these occasions, will not leave behind if it were to save your life; they'd keep the cart ten minutes to stow in dirty pipes and broken matches, to show their economy. Then you can find nothing you want for many days after you get into your new lodgings. You must comb your hair with your fingers, wash your hands without soap—go about in dirty gaiters. Were I Diogenes, I would not move out of a kindergarten into a hospital, though the first had nothing but smell beer in it, and the second racked climate. —Charles Lamb.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.—A Yankee and Irishman happening to be riding together, passed a galloway. "Where would you be?" said Jonathan, "if the galloway had his due?" "Riding alone, to be sure," said Pat. —Fat.

SINGULAR BEING.—At a place commonly called the World's End, near Kelghely, Yorkshire, a man named William Sharpe, who will attain the age of 93 years in January next, has kept his bed for 30 years, though neither lame nor sick. The cause of his first taking to bed is said to be from his father having at two different times taken from him three guineas which he had saved, gold being at that time very valuable. On the second three guineas being taken, he declared he would never work any more, and took to his bed, and has never since left it. He has his meals regularly four times a day, seldom refusing what is brought; never speaks, but generally lies rolled up in bed like a hedgehog, from which he is roused once a month, in order that clean sheets may be laid on the bed, &c. His beard is grisly, his hair silver, white, and enormous teeth proceed from his lips. It is said that at his father's death he was entitled to considerable property, but is prevented from enjoying it by his deteriorated perseverance in this most singular resolution. —Ibid.

EMIGRATION.—The mania for emigration seems to rage with great spirit in Germany; several vessels of emigrants from that country have put into Hull, and on Monday the Tiger brought from Hambrogh a ship-load of agriculturists and mechanics from Lower Germany, who are bound for the United States. The emigrants did not appear to be of the first class of their various occupations. —Daily Paper.

THE EXILES RETURN.—DUBLIN, May 6.—This day the Duke de Bordeaux (Henri V.) quitted, with the Duke de Levis, Count of Menthel, and Generals Fosseux, Lamuriz, and Loehmarie. Now that the Prince is of age these gentlemen form his household. The Prince will visit Dalmatia, Croatia, and the military frontiers of Transylvania. He will not return to Keroburg before three months. The Duke and Duchess d'Angoulême will be at Keroburg at the commencement of June. The Duke de Blacas will precede them a fortnight; he is at Vienna for his health. Many travellers have arrived here lately from France. —Angsbaburg Gazette, May 19.

JUNE 13, 1625.—HENRIETTA MARIA, youngest daughter to Henry IV. of France, landed at Dover, and was married to Charles I. King of England, at Canterbury, on the same day; her portraits represent her to have been beautiful. She was certainly a woman of ability, but fatal to her consort, after whose death on the scaffold she lived in France, and privately married her favourite, the Lord Jermyn, a descendant of whom, with that name, is (in 1825.) a grocer in Chiswell-street, and a member of the Society of Friends. Henrietta Maria, though a Bourbon, was so little regarded in the Court of the Bourbons, and redoubled to so great extremity, that she was without fuel for her fire-place during the depth of winter, in the palace assigned to her by the French monarch. —Fat.

ANOTHER CACON.—In digging last week on the farm of Mr. Whitefield, near North Mylin, in Deeping Fen, a canoe of extraordinary antiquity was found. In length it was 46 feet; the outside over end is 3 feet 8 inches wide, at the other only three feet, and in the middle 5 feet two inches. The thickness of the bottom is about six inches, and of the sides 4 inches reduced to 2½. There are ribs inside about 4 feet apart, for strength, projecting 3 inches, and about 3 inches wide. The inside depth at the wide end is 3 feet four inches, and at the other 3 feet. This singular canoe is of oak; it has a sort of keel, and was found lying on oak cross pieces. It is certain that it was hollowed out of one log, which appears to have couched at least 550 cubic feet. The tendency of iron soil to preserve wood is well known, and the date of this remarkable vessel is placed at a very remote antiquity indeed. —Lincoln Mercury.

GIVRAUX.—An Ukase has been issued at St. Petersburg to suppress the wandering habits of the gipsies in the Russian dominions, who are enjoined to provide themselves with fixed habitations before the 1st of January, 1841. —Fat.

CARCASSIA.—The St. Petersburg correspondent of the France, writing on the 23d ult., states that the Russian army, now concentrating near Southern Kale and Soudjook Kale, on the Abasian side of the Black Sea, for the subjugation of the Caucasian tribes, is to be 30,000 strong, with 96 pieces of artillery, about half of which forces have already arrived there. The Cosacks of the line are to be commanded by officers of the regular army. The forces on the lines of the Prut and the Danube are estimated, by the same authority, at 90,000 men, with a reserve of 40,000, provisioned for eight months. The Russian fleet is understood to be at Sinope, and, as well as the land forces, ready to assist the Sultan at the shortest notice.

Letters from Odessa of the 11th ult. mention a serious incident which occurred in the Russian army of the Caucasus. General Rajewski had ordered Colonel Makareff to make a reconnaissance on the left bank of the Coban, with the 6th Regiment of Cosacks of the line, composed of men who had been exiled to Siberia, and who were afterwards sentenced to serve during life as private soldiers. The colonel hesitated to comply. After remaining about three days, however, he returned to South-Kale with only one squadron of the regiment, the four others, together with their officers, having deserted to the Circassians. General Rajewski caused Colonel Makareff to be tried by a court-martial, which unanimously acquitted him; but the Czar directed that he be put on half-pay, and enjoin General Rajewski to dismiss all the Colonels of the Cosack regiments, without exception, and replace them by officers born in the north of European Russia. According to the same letters, the Altai of War was better occupied with a plan for bringing up all the Cosack regiments, and incorporating the men with the other corps of the army. The regiments actually forming parts of the troops of the Caucasus were to be immediately replaced by Hunsars and Lamers. Two other squadrons, in addition to the ones which sailed a few days before from Odessa, were sitting out at Sebastopol and Nikolaki. This naval force would, it was believed, be commanded by Rear-Admiral Prince Gortschakoff. —Ibid.

not unlike the chosen of all ranks. Instant protection was granted to the women found in the Ghedi, (among whom were those of Colonel Hyder, the Governor,) and sentries placed over the Magazine for its security. Brigadier Sale reports having received much assistance from Captain Kewell, of Her Majesty's 13th Light Infantry, throughout the whole of the service of the storming of the Ghedi.

Major General Sir Wilmshurst Cotton, remained in a manner much to my satisfaction the orders he had received. The Major General followed by the Assistant Adjutant General, and the other Officers, namely, Brigadier Roberts with the only available Regiment of his Brigade, the 36th Native Infantry under Lieutenant Colonel Mowbray, part of Brigadier Sale's Brigade, the 18th Native Infantry under Major Maclearen, and 4th Native Infantry under Lieutenant Colonel Wood, and they immediately occupied the Ramparts, putting down opposition wherever they met, and making prisoners until the place was completely in our possession. A desultory fire was kept up in the Town long after the Ghedi was in our hands, from those who had taken shelter in houses, and in desperation kept firing on all that approached them. In this way several of our men were wounded and some killed, but the aggressors paid dearly for their bad conduct in not surrendering when the place was completely in our hands. I must not omit to mention that three Companies of the 36th Native Infantry, under Captain Hay, ordered to the outside of the Fort to be in full arms, to attract attention to that side, performed that service to the proper time, and greatly to my satisfaction.

As we were threatened with an attack for the relief of the Garrison, I ordered the 18th Bombay Native Infantry, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Walker, to guard the Ghedi Road and to be in support of the Cavalry Division, in case they might have proved an important position to occupy, but, as it was, no enemy appeared.

The Cavalry Division under Major General Thickwell, in addition to watching the approach of an enemy, had directions to surround Unwan, and to sweep the plain to the south of the Fort, and to the Ghedi. Brigadier Arnold's Brigade (the Brigadier himself I deeply regret to say, was labouring under very severe illness, having shortly before been burnt to death internally, while residing at the Ghedi, in consequence of a horse falling on him), consisting of Her Majesty's 13th Lighters, under Lieutenant Colonel Povey, (temporarily commanding the Brigade, and Major Maclearen, the Junior Major of the Regiment, the Senior Major of the 13th Lighters, Major Thickwell, the other Adjutant General, having actively engaged in the execution of his duties as Assistant Adjutant General of the Cavalry Division,) the 2d Cavalry under Major Sale, and the 3d under Lieutenant Colonel Smith, were ordered to march to the south and sit down. Sir Sir Robert's Brigade were placed on the Ghedi Road, consisting of H. M.'s 4th Light Dragoons under Major Lloyd, and of the 1st Bombay Cavalry under Lieutenant Colonel Mowbray, to watch the Ghedi side. This day was performed in a manner greatly to my satisfaction. After the storming, and that our men were in some degree restored within, I conducted His Majesty's 13th Lighters, the British 13th and 14th, and the British 13th and 14th, to the Ghedi, to the south of the Fort, and to the Ghedi. The King was perfectly satisfied at our having made ourselves masters of a place considered to be impregnable when defended, in the short space of two hours, and in less than the great part of the Fort. The King was of course greatly delighted at the result. When I afterwards, in the name of His Majesty, took Alauddin Hyder Khan, the Governor, first to the British Minister and then to the King to make his submission, I informed His Majesty that I might have given that life should not be taken, and the King, in very handsome terms, accepted and informed Major Hyder, in my presence, that although he and his family had been rebels, yet he was willing to forget and forgive.

Prince Alauddin Hyder, the Governor of Unwan, is a Prisoner of War in my camp, and under the surveillance of Sir Alexander Burnes, my management very agreeable to the former.

From Major General Sir Wilmshurst Cotton, commanding the 1st Infantry Division, I have received the following report: "I have the great support, and on this occasion my exertions were made, to the credit of the honour of the profession and of our country."

I have likewise at all times received able and sound advice from Major General Wilmshurst, commanding the 2d Infantry Division of the Bombay Army, which it was found expedient on that day to break up, some for the storming party and some for other duties; the Major General, in his dispatch, was in attendance upon myself.

Brigadier Sale, I feel deeply indebted for the gallant and soldier-like manner in which he conducted the responsible and arduous duty entrusted to him in command of the storming party, and for the arrangements he made in the Ghedi, immediately after taking possession of it; the brave wound which he received in the face, did not prevent his continuing to direct his Column, until every thing was secure; and I am happy in the opportunity of bringing to your Lordship's notice the excellent conduct of Brigadier Sale.

Brigadier Stevenson, in the command of the Artillery, was all I could wish, and he reports that Brigadier Major Richardson and Captain only assisted him; his arrangements were good, and the execution done by the men he commanded, was such as cannot be forgotten by those of the enemy, who have witnessed and survived it.

Brigadier Roberts, to Colonel Dennis (who commanded the Artillery), and to the different Officers commanding Regiments already mentioned, as well as to the other brave and gallant soldiers under them, who so nobly maintained the honour and reputation of our country, my best acknowledgments are due.

To Captain Thomson, of the Bengal Engineers, the Chief of the Department with me, much of the credit of the success of this brilliant Campaign is due—a place of the same strength and by such simple means as this highly talented and scientific Officer recommended to be tried, has perhaps never before been taken, and I feel it cannot do sufficient justice to Captain Thomson's merits for his conduct throughout.

In execution, he was only supported by the Officers already mentioned, and so eager were they to follow him, that they were not only in the front for the honour of carrying the Fort, but the point could only be reached by seniority, which shows the fire feeling by which they are animated.

I must now inform your Lordship, that since I joined the Bengal Column in the Valley of the Ghedi, I have continued my march with it in the advance, and it has been my good fortune to have had the assistance of two most efficient Staff Officers, in Major Craigie, Deputy Adjutant General, and Major James Maclearen, Major General. It is but justice to those Officers, that I should state to your Lordship, the high satisfaction I have derived from the manner in which all their duties have been performed up to this day, and that I look upon them as promising Officers, to fill the higher ranks. To the other Officers of both Regiments, I am also much indebted for the correct performance of all duties upon their situations.

To Major Keith, the Deputy Adjutant General, and Major Campbell, the Deputy Quarter Master General of the Bombay Army, and to all the other Officers of both Departments, under them, my acknowledgments are also due, for the manner in which their duties have been performed during the Campaign.

Captain Alexander, commanding the 4th Bengal Local Horse, and Major Cunningham, commanding the Poona Auxiliary Horse, with the men under their orders, have been of essential service to the Army in the Campaign.

The arrangements made by Superintendent Surgeon Kennedy and Assistant Surgeon to the Surgeon, for affording assistance and comfort to the wounded, met with my approval.

Major Fawcett, the Deputy Quarter Master General in charge of the Department in the Field, has been successful in his situation to keep the Troop supplied, although much sickness is experienced, and in the locality the weather is the nature of the country and its high altitude.

I have throughout the service, provided the utmost assistance I could derive from a Lieutenant Colonel Macdonald, my Deputising Military Secretary, my Deputy Adjutant General Sir Major's Force, Bombay, the 4th Bengal Local Horse, the 4th Bengal Local Horse, and the other Officers of my Personal Staff. The nature of the country in which we are serving, prevents the possibility of my sending a single Staff Officer to deliver this to your Lordship, otherwise, I should have wished my Assistant Adjutant General, to proceed to Simla to deliver to your Lordship your hands, and to have afforded any further information that your Lordship could have wished.

The British triumph we have obtained, the cool courage displayed, and the gallant bearing of the Troops I have the honour to command, will have taught such a lesson to our enemies in the Afghanistan, as will make them hesitate to attempt to deliver to your Lordship your hands, and to have afforded any further information that your Lordship could have wished.

The loss of the enemy is immense—we have already buried of their dead nearly 200, together with an immense number of others.

I enclose a list of the killed, wounded and missing; I am happy to say, in a although the wounds of some of the Officers are severe, they are all doing well.

It is my intention, after selecting a Garrison for this place, and establishing a General Hospital, to continue my march to Calcutta forthwith.

(Signed) JOHN KEANE, Lieut.-General.

THE NEW ACT.—The Act for vesting the cognizance of cases of petty larceny in the Magistrates of Calcutta, within the limits of the Metropolis, has, at length, passed Council, and become the law of the land, with one modification. The term of imprisonment to which the Magistrate was permitted to sentence a criminal, has been reduced from twelve to six months. We trust the Act will be found as beneficial in practice, as it is benevolent in design; and that those evils which have been foreboded from its operation, doubtless, with the kindest intention, will not be realized. It is no small argument in its favour, that the community of Calcutta has not been prevailed on by the long continued entreaties of the press, to assemble at the Town Hall, and to petition against it. Some have been disposed to attribute this slowness to the absence of benevolent feeling; but we are rather inclined to ascribe it to a general conviction of the wisdom and necessity of the enactment. Considering how likely even the wisest laws are to the risk of failure, we consider the activity of the press, during the period of its gestation, a happy omen; because we are convinced that the same activity will be uselessly employed in watching its progress, and in pointing out, for the guidance of the Legislature, any grievances to which it may give birth. Should it eventually be found to contain more of alloy than of the pure metal of justice, there can be little doubt that the same motives which led to the adoption of it, will secure its modification and improvement.

We are at a loss to conceive upon what ground the Herald has been led to suppose, that the final passing of the Act was intentionally postponed to a period, when it could not physically have reached England before the Session of Parliament was closed. If our Local Legislature, instead of resting the defence of its acts upon the broad principles of equity and reason, is disposed to descend to the little trickery implied in such an insinuation, and to plume itself on having stolen a march on Parliament, the sooner it is dissolved the better. If our contemporary, however, will consult the original Draft of the Act, he will, perhaps, find, that this is but a fresh instance of the fantastic tricks which a warm imagination is apt to play with the judgement. He will find that the time originally fixed for the final discussion and adoption of the Act, was such as scarcely to admit of its reaching England before the close of the Session, and that Government has gained nothing by the delay. Even if it had reached London during the last three weeks of the Session, when the business of months is crowded into weeks, and of weeks into days, we are confident that no prudent agent would have ventured to intrude it on the attention of the exhausted members. Those who design to bring the question before Parliament,—if there be any such,—will find that the tardy adoption of the Act in this country, so far as it constrains them to initiate proceedings at issue in the freshness of a new Session, is altogether in their favour, and is cause for gratitude rather than censure.

But it would be imprudent to flatter ourselves that any thing is to be hoped from Parliamentary interference, or that the present Act will command even the same decent measure of attention, which was bestowed on the Act, facetiously called, Black. We question whether the denigration of another barrier from the Supreme Court, would achieve more in this case, than in the other; and we would warmly advise the expectation. For the great objection which has been brought against the Act, is, that it affects the authority of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland. Supposing,—though not admitting,—this to be the case, that august body appears to be far less sensitive on the subject of these encroachments, than the conductors of the Calcutta papers, and to be far more dead to a sense of its own dignity. This does not appear, however, to arise from any want of sensibility on the subject: of its own privileges, which it guards with the most constitutional jealousy. The last Mail brought information, that the House had taken fire at the small encroachment made on its authority by the Court of Queen's Bench; and that a Committee had been appointed to search the archives; and for aught we know, the House may now be at open feud with the Bench. Yet, Lords and Commons bear with equal indifference, that the Legislative Council of India is repealing enactments after enactment of the laws of England, and making the Omnipotence of Parliament a bye-word among a hundred millions of the subjects of the Crown in India. And nothing, it seems, can disturb this feeling of indifference; neither the protestations of the Press in Calcutta; nor the petitions of the Indian community; nor even the activity of an agent on the spot, whispering into the ears of members the undulgence of the Legislative Council. In these circumstances, we must dismiss all hope that Parliament will vindicate its own dignity on the present occasion, by recalling Mr. Amos, and annulling the Act.

A still stronger reason against the probability of any interference on the part of the grand Council of the Nation, is furnished by the fact, that the present Act is drawn up on the model of an Act of Parliament. If the reader will turn to the 33d, George the 11th, chap. 155, Sect. 105, he will find the following enactment:—

“And whereas His Majesty's British subjects resident in the British territories in India, without the towns of Calcutta, Madras, and the town and island of Bombay, are now, by law, subject only to the jurisdiction of His Majesty's Courts at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay respectively, and are exempted from the jurisdiction of the courts established by the said United Company within the said territories, to which all other persons, whether natives or others, inhabitants in the said territories, without the limits of the towns aforesaid, are amenable: And whereas it is expedient to provide more effectual redress for the native inhabitants of the said territories, as well in the case of assault, forcible entry, or other injury, accompanied with force, which may be committed by British subjects at a distance from the places where His Majesty's Courts are established, as in case of civil controversies with such British subjects; Be it therefore enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any native of India, resident in the East Indies, or parts aforesaid, and without the said towns, in case of any assault, forcible entry, or other injury accompanied with force, alleged to have been done against his person or property by a British subject, to complain of such assault, forcible entry, or other injury accompanied with force, (not being felony,) to the magistrate of the sikkah or district, where the alleged offender shall be resident, or in which such offence shall have been committed; and that such magistrate shall have power and authority, at the instance of the person so complaining, to take cognizance of such complaint, to hear parties, to examine witnesses, and, having taken in writing the substance of the complaint, defence, and evidence, to acquit or convict the person accused; and in case of conviction, to inflict upon such person a suitable punishment by fine, not exceeding five hundred rupees, to be levied in case of non-payment by warrant under the hand of the said magistrate, and upon any property of the party so convicted, which may be found within the said district; and if no such property shall be found within the said district, then it shall be lawful for the said magistrate, by warrant under his hand, to commit such offender to some place of confinement within the said sillah or district, within the judgment of the said magistrate shall be fit for receiving such offender; or if there shall be no fit place of confinement, then to the goal of the Presidency, to remain there for a period not exceeding two months, unless such fine shall be sooner paid; and it shall be lawful for the said magistrate to award the whole or any portion of such fine to the party aggrieved, by way of satisfaction for such injury: Provided always, That in all cases of conviction of a British subject, under the provision herein-before contained, the magistrate before whom such conviction shall take place, shall forthwith transmit copies of such conviction, and of all depositions and other proceedings relative thereto, to the Government to which the place wherein the offense was committed is or shall be subordinate: Provided also, That all such fines shall be paid, in the first instance, to the magistrate before whom the party offending shall be convicted, and the amount thereof, after making such satisfaction to the party aggrieved, as aforesaid, if any, shall be transmitted by such magistrate to the clerk of the crown, or other officer to whom it belongs to receive fines in His Majesty's Court of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery for the province within which the offense shall have been committed; and such fines shall and may be disposed of in the same manner as other fines imposed by such Court of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery: Provided also, That all such convictions shall and may be removable by writ of certiorari into the said Court of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery: positively, in the same manner and upon the same terms and condition, and shall be proceeded upon in the same manner in every respect, as is enacted in the said Act of the thirty-third year of His Majesty's reign, with regard to other convictions before Justices of peace in the British settlements or territories in India: Provided also, That nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent such Magistrate from committing or holding to bail any British subject, charged with any such offense before him, in the same manner as such British subject might have been committed or helden to bail if this Act had not been passed, where the offense charged shall appear to such Magistrate, to be of so aggravated a nature as to be a fit subject for prosecution in any of His Majesty's Courts to which such British subject may be amenable."

Here we perceive that Parliament has set the Legislative Council the example of providing for the adjudication of cases, in which Europeans are interested, by a Justice of the Peace, without the intervention of a Jury; and it is not to be supposed, that the adoption of its own principle will be visited with any severe chastisement. The reader will farther perceive, that the only remedy which Parliament thought fit to give the European settler, for the error or oppression of a Justice of the Peace, was a Writ of Certiorari, to remove the cognizance of the cause to the Supreme Court. The Legislative Council has, therefore, only followed in the footsteps of the British Parliament. If it errs, it errs in the best company. If it be wrong, Parliament was wrong before it. If the privilege of removing a case by certiorari, be the ne plus ultra of impudence, and the quintessence of hubris, as the Englishman calls it, it has, at least, the honor of a parliamentary parentage; and surely Parliament will not be so extremely vexed at seeing the image of its own offspring reflected in an Act of the Indian Legislature.

As to the question whether the Writ of Certiorari be practically a humbug or not, it is humiliating to be obliged to confess, that our contemporary is not far from the truth. Only let it be remembered, that it is not Parliament, or the Legislative Council of India, which denies to the aggrieved the benefit of that time honoured institution, a Jury. Neither the Home nor the Local Legislature deprives the Englishman of the exercise of his birth-right, to appeal from an unjust decision. If the path of justice is blocked up by fees; by whom were they created, and for whose benefit do they exist? Who is it that, after the right of Englishmen to a Trial by Jury has been recognized, both in England and here, stops the suitor at the portal of justice, and denies him entrance, if he be poor and unable to pay his way? Far be it from us to assert that the institution of fees is not a good and laudable practice, especially for those who receive them; or that the fees which have been established in this land are more exorbitant than those in England; but this it may be reasonable for us to assert, that when the Local Legislature leaves the aggrieved man to the parliamentary remedy of a Writ of Certiorari, and Trial by Jury; if the Supreme Court denies him the power of exercising that right, unless he be wealthy enough to pay all the fees of its officers; and if the unfortunate man be, in consequence, denied the privilege of Trial by Jury, the fault does not lie with the Legislative Council.

We had intended to say something about the objection, that this makes one law for the poor and another for the rich; and to show that the same objection lies against the whole system of jurisprudence in India, and still more against that system of law which prevails in England, and in which there is law for the rich, but none at all for the poor; but this would open another branch of the subject, and the reader is doubtless, tired both of us and the Act.

THE CODE UNIVERSAL.—The papers of the Bombay Presidency object to the present arrangement of the Law Commission, more especially at a time when it is engaged in drawing up rules of judicial procedure, intended for the whole of India. They object equally to the existing constitution of the Supreme Council of India, which controuls the movements of all the Presidencies. They affirm, and with truth, that, contrary to the intention of Parliament, the interests of Bombay and Madras are not represented in either body; and this objection will remain valid, until some new arrangement shall give those bodies a more satisfactory constitution. But, supposing the objection removed, in reference to the Law Commission, of what practical benefit would it prove? Would it expedite the movements in Leadenhall Street and Cannon Row? Is there that the matter of the Code sleeps; and is it the Court of Directors and the Board of Control who must adopt more energetic proceedings before the expectations of any portion of the Indian community, European or Native, can be satisfied. At present the Home Authorities lie under the opprobrium of having saddled the revenues of India with a heavy annual burden, without any serious intention of bestowing any benefit in return.

It is now nearly two years since the Criminal Code was presented to Government, and printed. And what effort has been made, during this period, to give practical effect to the labours of the Commission? Since the Code reached England, has it not slumbered in neglect on the shelf? It cannot be intended to pass a Code which so vitally affects the honour, the liberty, and the dearest interests of the people of India, without giving them the opportunity of offering their judgment on its provisions;—yet no step has been taken towards the translation of it, even into the language of Bengal. As the Code is to become the law of all India, it would, however, be selfish to confine a puerile knowledge of its provisions to the inhabitants of one province. To do justice to all India, the Code must be submitted to its varied population in their own tongues, not only in Bengalee, but in Hinduee, in Persian, in Tamil, in Telooquo, in Malayalam, in Canaree, in Maharratta, in Guzerattee, even if we omit the Orija and the Burmese. It may seem strange to require a translation of the Code into so many languages; but is it not necessary to the perfection of the work? When Parliament adopted the magnificent idea of bestowing a Code on India, which should remain a perpetual monument of British wisdom and British benevolence, which should give to a hundred millions of people a common interest in our administration, by the enjoyment of a uniform system of laws, it was bound to make a provision for the full and complete accomplishment of its wishes, by the diffusion of the Code among all the tribes, and by its translation into all the languages of India. Those translations have not yet been commenced. From the time when they are entered on, two full years must be allowed for their completion and promulgation, and for the reception and digestion of all the opinions which the Natives may offer. This will carry us into the eighth year of codification, before the first branch of the Code can come into operation; and, fortunate shall we be, if some of the thousand accidents to which human affairs are liable, do not postpone it to a more distant period.

We are fully aware that the Code has been stigmatized as the Macaulay Code; and that the opprobrium which it was thought meet to cast on Mr. Macaulay, has been transferred to the Code. We are aware that the member for Edinburgh is not considered in India as possessing the most ordinary talents; and that any thing which proceeded from his pen, or which bore the stamp of his mind, could not, it was supposed, be too early consigned to oblivion. We are aware likewise that a very amusing discrepancy of opinion on this subject prevails in England and India. But what has this to do with the Code? We are not to forget that we have a right to a Code, founded on Parliamentary promise; that this Criminal Code embodies the views of other members of the Commission, besides Mr. Macaulay; that his connection with it was altogether gratuitous. Above all, we cannot forget that it has cost India within a shade of Eight Lakhs of Rupees, Eighty Thousand Pounds Sterling, and that to treat it with the contempt it has received, is to trifle with the interests of India, and to mock the people with expectations for which they are called to pay, but which are never to be realized. If there be any Macaulay weeds in the Code, some lawyer might be found to grub them up for a thousand pounds, or so. If there be any thing crooked in it, let it be made straight; if any thing deficient, let it be supplied. And if the Code be utterly worthless, and incapable of amendment, let the Law Commission be set to the compilation of a new one. But let there be something tangible given to India, commensurate with the money that has been expended, and the hopes that have been raised. If the progress of the other branches of the Code is to be measured by that of its first born, the Code itself will scarcely be completed within the period of the present Charter; and the Law Commission will become as offensive in the eyes of all men of discernment, as the Taubere Commission. If the Home Authorities intend to treat the future labours of this body with the same comeliness which they have cast on its past exertions, it would be better to dissolve the Commission altogether, and to lay out the salaries in building "Great Easterns" for our eastern seas.

THE COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.—It would appear, from the observations of the Hibernian, on Saturday last, that our meaning must have been greatly misapprehended, in respect of the Education Committee, and its failures. In our article, on the 25th of July, we quoted the language of the Committee itself, in proof that its system had failed in the Western Provinces. The admission of the Committee, it is true, is very smoothly worded—"in some places, particularly in Western India, our system of education has not yet attained the popularity, which it enjoys in the Bengal Provinces." But what is thus gently hinted, is afterwards seen to be of a much more mortifying character, when these terms would indicate, when the Committee go on to threaten, they will "transfer the appropriations made in favour of those places to other spots, where the boon which we offer may be more appreciated." The failure must be complete, when the undertaking is to be abandoned.

Guided by the admission and the threat of the Committee, we proceeded to examine to what extent they applied. Looking at the tables furnished by the Report, of the whole of the Schools in the Western Provinces, in which the system of the Committee is in operation, we found them to be as follows, in respect of the number of students attending them at the close of 1836 and 1837 respectively, and the expense of each to the Committee, in addition to the charges defrayed by local contributions:

	1836.	1837.	Monthly Expense.
Benares Seminary, ...	142	147	Rs. 527
Agra College, Eng. Dep. ...	118	131	1288
Delhi Institution, ...	110	84	709
Alhambad School, ...	91	91	465
Meerut School, ...	106	86	405
Patna School, ...	102	109	333
Ajmere School, ...	0	48	305
Saugor School, ...	39	144	297
Ghazepore School, ...	57	69	200
Gormuckpore School, ...	53	50	200
Furruckabad School, ...	30	53	275
Jubbulpore School, ...	17	24	125
Hoshungabad School, ...	20	23	70
Bareilly School, ...	60	60	230
Azimgur School, ...	0	41	130
Arrah School, ...	0	33	100

This is the whole extent to which the system of the Committee is applied in the Western Provinces. There are sixteen Seminaries, in the midst of at least three times as many millions of people; and can any one look at the statement of them without receiving the conviction, that as a whole, they are a failure? As before, we except the Seminaries at Benares, Agra and Saugor. These appear to have a respectable and well sustained attendance. We can confidently assert, that, besides these three, there is not another that gives satisfaction to the Committee as successful in its operation. Either the attendance is paltry and insignificant, or it has attained a stagnant stationary mediocrity, or it is dwindling away, through an indifference that has succeeded the first excitement of curiosity and novelty. If we turn from the numerical statements to the body of the Report, we find the impression they have made only strengthened by the complaints of the Local Committees and the Masters, of the want of interest in the population, and the irregularity and discouraging progress of the scholars.

We maintain, then, that the Report of the Committee is itself sufficient, to bear us out in our assertion, that the English School system has failed in the Western Provinces; and that if Public Education is to remain solely in the hands of the present Committee, the education of those provinces is postponed indefinitely. We have also less partial authority for the same statement, in the communications we have received from the Western Provinces; and we imagine the Committee must have some testimonies of similar import. But on that we do not at present rest our argument. The Ajmere School was not particularly in our thoughts, when we wrote on the subject before; nor should we attach much importance to any individual case alone. Every school must be liable to vicissitudes, such as our contemporary has related of that at Ajmere, which make nothing either for or against the system pursued in it. But columns such as we have taken from the Report of the Committee afford a different sort of testimony.

We are charged with hostility to English instruction; and, as we have professed the contrary, on every occasion we have had for referring to the subject, and even maintained by lengthened and earnest arguments, the high importance of English instruction, against those who undervalue it, we conclude there must be some obliquity of judgement in the party making the charge, against which it is useless to strive. Yet these are articles of our belief in this matter: We hold that Native Education in the English language is of the greatest value, and cannot be too largely extended through the country, because the more it is promoted, the closer will the attachment and sympathy of the people be drawn to our country, our institutions, and our principles: We hold that in many places, a knowledge of the English language is greatly coveted by the Natives, with a view to official or commercial employment, and as an accomplishment becoming every day more necessary to an honourable position in society; and this disposition ought to be taken advantage of, for throwing as much as possible of English knowledge into the Native mind, while it is becoming familiar with the English tongue: We hold also that it is very convenient and easy, for English teachers to communicate the knowledge they possess, in their own language, which they fully understand; and, therefore, the organization of English Schools for communicating European knowledge is far easier for the present, than the institution of equally well taught vernacular schools having the same object: We likewise hold that the English language is in itself worthy of a distinguished place in a liberal education anywhere, and most especially in a country dependent, as India is, upon England.

But, on the other hand, it is a fact, that through much the greater part of India, English instruction is repulsive and not attractive to the people and their children, who will not receive knowledge by its means: It is equally a fact, that knowledge is indissolubly wedded neither to English, nor to any other language whatever, but consists of records, facts, and doctrines which may be acquired with the utmost precision and force in any cultivated language, and certainly in the chief vernacular languages of India: It is a fact, too, that the communication of knowledge to youth in their own tongue, requires of them but a single task, whereas the English system exacts another, and that yet more arduous, the acquisition of a foreign tongue with vocabularies, idioms, and usages the most strange conceivable to those who have to master them: It is another fact, that English instruction requires a class of teachers, the necessary amount of whose salaries makes the general extension of the system an impossibility: Again it is a fact, that society is wholly disorganized by ignorance and vice, and immediate and universal education is a State necessity, without which no laws or administration will be of any material use in bettering the condition and character of the people: It is a fact, that where, as in Calcutta, Chinsurah, Barhwan, Dacca, and Benares, European knowledge has been given elementarily in vernacular schools, the thirst for larger communications, and direct access to the English fountains of illumination, has been extensively excited. These and many other facts there are, which all combine to shew, that our present educational system is totally inadequate to the wants it professes to supply; and even for success on the miserably contracted scale to which it is limited, requires much modification. We shall have more to scribble on the subject, and need not now weary the attention of our readers further.

CONVICT RATIONS.—On the 18th of May last, in directing attention to the Resolution of the Bengal Government, on the Report of the Prison Discipline Committee, we gave our opinion very freely against the mode in which the subject of rations for the prisoners had been disposed of. And on the 23d of the same month, we were enabled by before our readers, the principal paragraphs of the Resolution of the Deputy Governor of Bengal, of the 9th April, against which our objections lay. We are happy to find that the subject has been taken up again, and in such a manner as to show the anxiety of Government to treat the convicts at once with prudence and humanity. The new order appears in the form of a Circular from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, under the direction of the Government of Bengal: which professes to be an explanation, but looks more like an amendment, of the Resolution of the 9th April.

After laying down the principle, that "Government undertakes to keep convicts in health and fit for labour, and this must be done without any reference to the state of the market," the Circular proceeds thus:

"2nd. The Magistrates are to give to the prisoners such rations as they may think fit and sufficient, consulting the inclination and the habits of the prisoners, as far as may be deemed humane, and within the limits of a just economy, and bearing in mind the sound principle, that no prisoner is to be allowed, when in jail, luxuries not usually necessary to persons of his class when out of jail, and not necessary to keep working men in a state of health. And general rules, the quantity of food to be given is to be regulated by the state of the day, viz. one sort of rice, exclusive of an necessary allowance of kichow and tobacco.

"3rd. Solitary cooking is to be discontinued, and if possible, presented: and messes are to be arranged as far as is possible. For messes, cooks should be appointed in proportion among the prisoners or otherwise, as may seem practicable and proper. It was expected that the Magistrates, after determining upon the diet, would divide the prisoners into messes with their several cooks, and the food served in the daily meal—on one day rice and shell, on another, fish and fish, on a third, rice and vegetables, and so on, serving out the several quantities of each article of food at intervals of each per ann (with the standard of quantity) according to the number in each mess. This is precisely what is done on board ships, in barracks, in European prisons, and wherever else rations are given, and this is all that is now required to be done in the District Jails of Bengal.

"4th. Money is not to be carried into jails: *****
"5th. The prisoners should not be permitted to barter rice for condiments. As already explained, they will receive each, their rations within the standard fixed upon, as the Magistrate may determine: ***** but he (the prisoner) will not make this matter himself.

"6th. It only remains to observe, that nothing in this resolution was intended to limit the quantity to one sort, if that quantity be found really inadequate."

We should have preferred, that still more exact instructions had been issued, and less been left to the discretion of the Magistrates: and we cannot but think it would have been better, that, in every case, cooks had been appointed not from amongst the prisoners; and the prisoners ought most certainly to have received their food in two daily meals and not in one, as at present. Nevertheless we consider the case to be much improved by the Circular.

FALL OF CABOOL.—The object of the expedition beyond the Indus has been brought to a happy termination, without further bloodshed. As the combined army approached Cabool, Dost Mahomed Khan came out with his troops to encounter them; but the capture of Ghizni was too deeply imprinted on their minds to admit of their offering any resistance. Before seeing the British troops, they forsook their Chief, and he was constrained to abandon all his guns and ammunition, and break himself to flight. Shah Sujah contered peacefully into possession of his Capital, on the 6th of August, and the toils of the army were rewarded by complete success.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist upon the necessity, the equity, or the policy of this expedition, there can be no diversity of sentiment regarding the noble and exemplary conduct exhibited by the British army, throughout this harassing campaign. The splendour of its martial achievements, when brought into collum with the enemy, is eclipsed by the patient endurance of fatigue and privations, in circumstances the most distressing. Relative to the consequences which are likely to result from the success of this expedition, it is impossible to speak with any confidence. Some entertain that it will serve to give additional security to this empire; while others persist in asserting, that it will bring ten thousand Russian bayonets to the banks of the Indus; but few will deny the advantage which must result from the perfect acquaintance we have now obtained of the military topography of the region beyond the Indus, which furnished the most insupportable point of our frontier; and through which alone we had any reason to apprehend the approach of a hostile army. And all will unite in exclaiming, that these necessities to our barbarical and historical knowledge, which may be confidently expected from the free access of Europeans to Afghanistan. From Giddisba we may soon expect an Afghan Fleet, which shall fill Robert Brown, and Hooker, and Lindley, and the Campbell, and other excellent boats in Europe, with a perfect rest of joy. From the self-sufficiency which are to be found in the Army of the Indus, we shall look for illustrations of the progress of Alexander, and of the Bactrian dynasties, which will shed a flood of light on those periods of history which have hitherto been involved in obscurity. Whatever the great politicians of Europe may think of the movement beyond the Indus, the seavans will look at Lord Auckland for having brought so large a domain within the range of scientific research.

TRANSPORTATION.—The papers which have just reached us from Penang, furnish a very apt illustration of the remarks made in the Report of the Prison Discipline Committee, on the insubordination of transported convicts in the Straits. The Committee observed, that in consequence of "the agreeable life which the convicts there lead, the terror of transportation has greatly diminished in some maritime parts of the country. This is a great evil, but it arises solely from the mismanagement of the convicts in the Straits, and the remedy is very simple."—"That the convicts are now insubordinated at Penang and Malacca seems a good reason for improving the discipline at those two places; but not for sending all convicts elsewhere." The Penang Gazette furnishes us with the following statement, regarding not so much the lax discipline, but the total absence of all discipline, which prevails in reference to the convicts who are transported thither.

"They are not subjected to even an appearance of punishment. They are employed in offices to the prejudice and injury of honest men, who are sometimes placed beneath them. They are free from the slightest restraint; they live in garden houses; drive about in palanquins like the most worthy of the land, and are, generally speaking, in absolute ease and comfort. Notwithstanding all that has been said, and the experience of years, we are told that convicts are still employed in the post-office, and up to a very late period in the convict office of this Island, though we imagine certain transactions in this latter department, more before government, have shown them the impracticability (except to the parties themselves) of employing convicted rogues in places of confidence and trust."

In consequence of the absence of all severity of control over the transported convicts, the notorious Raj Kishore

Dutt, who founded the Bank of India some years ago in Calcutta, for the most felonious of objects, and counterfeited Public Securities to the extent of many lakhs of Rupees, and who was transported to Penang, has been discovered in the net of forging dollars, in company with Joseph Warr, also a convict, a Christian, from Bengal, who has for many years been acting clerk to several Engineers, and other officers, who have had charge of the public works. Raj Kishore Dutt, on his examination, stated, after some prevarication, that he had been constrained to resort to this mode of subsistence, because his friends in Calcutta had so completely deserted him, that he had received no assistance from them for two years. The Editor looks on behind the scenes, when he alludes to the "respectable friends who had been in the habit of slinking hands with him in Bench Street, and conducting themselves with him in mercantile transactions." Mercantile transactions with the most subtle, crafty, confirmed villain which Calcutta has produced for many years! Surely such a state of things should be brought to an immediate termination.

MECHANICS INSTITUTION.—We are glad to see an Advancement for "a Teacher capable of affording instruction in the Mathematical and Mechanical Sciences," for the evening schools of the Mechanics Institution. We hope some competent person will be found to undertake the duty, whose zeal and ability will help to redress the character of the Institution, from the reproach into which it has fallen. The situation promises no great emolument; but it may furnish great scope for usefulness, to any gentleman who has his evenings at his own disposal, and possesses suitable accomplishments.

PROGRESS OF OPINION IN AMERICA.—It is exceedingly satisfactory to the supporters of going to feel his opinions really in abeyance. There is no more an impartial proof of their success. This subscription the Slavery-Abolitionists of America are now enjoying. The last and strongest expression of the fears of their opponents we have seen, is contained in a publication entitled, 'A Tenth from America to England: by an American Gentleman,' of which we had a notice in the Advocate of the 13th April last. Of this Gentleman and his production, the English reviewer says: "there is so much internal evidence of ill-feeling towards those who favour abolition—so much weak and untimely argument—so much plain sophistry—such outbreaks of petulance and temper, as would justify the supposition that the writer is nothing better than a paid advocate." We should be glad to learn that the supposition was correct; for the closer the connection of the writer with the Anti-abolition party, the more valuable is every indication of hostility of present alarm, or of future anticipation or purpose. Now, according to the testimony of this person, it appears that the Abolitionists, instead of being, as they were a little time ago, "a minority injured in their properties, endangered in their persons, covered with obloquy and ridicule," have not only "assumed an aggressive attitude, but offer a front of such wide extension, as threatens to overturn not only American Slavery, but the American Constitution into the bargain." The terms we quote, are not those of the American, but of his reviewer, in giving an abstract of his statements. The position which he ascribes to the Abolitionists is, that they have adopted the Religious and Benevolent Society system so effectively as to have spread their influence through all parts of the Union. In the state of New York, of the 200,000 voters who form its constituency, 40,000 are at their command; and hence they are quite able to "turn the scale wherever they cast their influence, whether for national or state officers of Government."

If this representation is just, it needs no prophetic vision to assure us, that the end of slavery in America is at hand. It will require but few general elections to produce a Congress ready to rescind the present despotic rule, that the subject of slavery is not to be discussed, but that petitions respecting it to be cast under the table in silence. And when discussion begins, slavery dies. The policy of its upholders therefore is, if it be yet possible, to suppress the agency by which the dreaded progress towards discussion is promoted. For this purpose, the combination of the Abolitionists is described as a portion of the Religious Society system; and that system is portrayed as a new and fearful monster, the enemy alike of government and freedom, against which it is high time to arouse the passion and the energy of the world. The reviewer in the Athenaeum quotes the following string of passages from the American:

"The separation of Church and State, and other causes, have given rise to a new species of social organization, before unknown in history; and one of a very important and formidable character, and prolific of great results, though public attention has not yet been much directed to it, as involving such a tendency. Within the space of about thirty years it has entirely changed the character and aspects of the American religious world. * * * Then opened on that world the new era of the Religious and Benevolent Society system, and summoned into the field an immense body of superior and lightly-cultivated talent, which had long lain inactive, and in abeyance to such a call. It was very schemes, of all others, which the age, the state of society, and the unorganized mass of the religious world, demanded. It was the offspring of circumstances. * * * The Religious and Benevolent Society system is a system so entirely independent of the State, that the State cannot reach it; it is so powerful that the State cannot contend with it; it is so all-pervading, that it comprehends the State itself, in its individual parts, and in its most vital and influential portions. It has stolen a march on the public, on 'the powers that be,' on the world. It has called out and disciplined to its various offices some of the best and most cultivated portions of the mind of the country—some of the most talented, active, ambitious, and aspiring spirits. * * * The system is a new one, and has given birth to a new era, an era of self-organized, self-organized, self-governed, independent, irresponsible, permanent, popular associations, of unlimited powers, which have asked no leave to be, and submit to no control; which are forming the public mind according to their own will, and directing it to their own purposes. * * * Wherever there must needs be associations, national and subsidiary, and agencies innumerable—consolidated and centralized governments in this department of society, supervised by presidents, secretaries, and boards of managers, putting in requisition—on account of the variety, extent, and vastness of these concerns—as much talent, sole devotion, and practical tact, as are ordinarily required to conduct the affairs of a nation. It has given birth to a new system of politics, the machinery of which is remote from public view, silent in its operation, but no less efficient on the public mind. * * * As to the right or wrong of these institutions, or as to whether they are good or bad, is not, in this place, a subject of inquiry; but simply the fact of their social importance and their power. And we say, that in America, it is great; say, we think it has obtained a supremacy of influence over the State. These voluntary associations are so numerous, so great, so active and influential, that, as a whole, they now constitute the great school of public education, in the formation of those practical opinions, religious, social, and political, which lead the public mind, and govern the country; at least, exercise an influence over the State, which cannot be resisted."

We shall not stay to inquire into the justice of these representations, in reference either to America or England, nor attempt to qualify them so as to give a version that would accord with our own views. We are content to obtain from them the fact, that the power of Christian principle and zeal, embodied in voluntary Associations for holy and benevolent purposes, has become so strong as effectually to disturb the peace and security of the world in its evil ways. It is alarmed for its pomp, its pleasures, and its wages of unrighteousness. A little longer, and it will not be able to keep a single slave, or see any more of the pomp and circumstance of war, or riot in drunken license, or relieve its heart in cursing, or quench its fears and sense together in unbelief, or hold the multitude in thrall through ignorance. Nothing will be left it, of the evil it has put for good, the bitter it has taken for sweet, and the darkness it has chosen for light. It is well the change is so near, as to have come within observation of those it will affect.

But though they see, they are not reconciled to its approach. They abhor it, and give it a bad name. It is not with them, the triumph of truth, the abolition of wrong and oppression, the emancipation of mankind, the reign of justice, the dawn of heaven; but it is the overthrow of the powers that be, and the introduction of a fanatical domination over the State, and all the individuals who compose it. In this representation, however, it is forgotten, that when a sufficient number in the community shall have imbibed such sentiments, and formed such combinations, as will no longer allow the world to go on in its old way, but remodel both people and rulers according to religious principle, they will have themselves become the state of which they are derided as being the antagonists. The Reviewer in the Athenaeum puts the case in this way: "If it be really true that the entire population is so penetrated with an intemperate desire to interfere with the religion and morals of their neighbours as to have reimagined themselves for the purpose,—if they 'comprehend the State itself, in its individual parts, and in its most vital and influential portions,' why then they are no imperium in imperio—they are at once government and people, and they cannot be put down. Further, if a deep religious feeling (be it fanatical or rational) does exist in the North as decidedly against slavery, as a state unchristian and intolerable to their moral sense, then, an authoritative suppression of societies is at once politically impossible, and, as a means towards an end, inefficient and absurd."

The appearance of the American's arguments seems to us to be a new sign of the times, which is well worthy of note. Something of the kind, indeed, had come out in the pamphlets of the Rev. Sidney Smith; who, improving upon the old argument in support of the Established Church, that, in its well educated clergy, it placed a sort of nest egg of gentility in every parish, has maintained that the world will have good reason to lament the decline and fall of the Church, seeing it presents the most effective check to the progress of fanaticism, and by its forms, its pomps, and, above all, its lottery of preferences, accommodates religion to the world, and gives this money-getting, honour-seeking, pleasure-loving age a new edition of the antiquated, strait-laced faith of the Apostles that accords entirely with its own mind and spirit. The argument of the witty Prebendary was so revolting to all the serious and devout adherents of the Establishment, and so inconsistent even for its mere political advocates, that there was no danger of its being turned to account by any party, against the cause of real religion. But it is otherwise with the notions of the American. They exhibit to us a position that will be taken up against the progress of righteousness. It is well, therefore, we should examine it, and know its strength. We are convinced it is unsound; and nothing can give it a foundation of truth, but inconsistency in the promoters of religious reformation, in betaking themselves to weapons of worldly policy, instead of those that are spiritual and holy. We hope the danger will be generally foreseen, and guarded against.

WEEKLY EPIITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 5.

The Siamese and Burmese Governments have followed the example of the paramount power in Eastern Asia, that of China, in regard to the Opium. The Siamese authorities have sent orders to all the ports, strictly to prohibit the importation of Opium, and to enforce the destruction of all that can be found. The annual exportation of the drug from Penang to the five maritime provinces of Siam, has been from 150 to 160 chests. Tharawadda has sent the strictest orders in Rangoon, to prevent the introduction of the drug; of which the import has increased in one year, from twenty to two hundred chests. Thus every port, from Cape Negrais, to the most northern part of the Yellow Sea, throughout the maritime provinces of Borneo, Siam, Ceylon, China and Japan, is closed against the introduction of the drug.—The account given of the ineffectuality of the new Steamers, the Zenobia, to face the monsoon, which was published in the Bombay Times, is contradicted by a Correspondent, Tadmar, whose statement would certainly have been entitled to more credit, if he had avoided the use of such elegant phraseology, as that the Press had at last fixed its denizen share on the Zenobia. He confesses that she is a "slow coach," but very sure, and quite equal to a struggle with the monsoon.—They have it at Madras, that the Committee for the management of the restored Mint, has actually been appointed. Greenway's Agency furnishes some valuable data respecting the Minis in the Western Provinces, the abolition of which is described as having been detrimental to their trade and manufactures.—The H. G. Corbett, the Amherst, with the Commissioner of Aracan, Capt. Dugan, on board, sailed for the Tenasserim Coast, in company with the Engle Yacht, each with a full complement of guns and ammunition.—The Intelligence from Manipal is very deplorable. Some discord having arisen between the town's people and the sepoys of the 24th N. I. stationed there, the fault of the latter, about thirty of the sepoys proceeded, on the evening of the 2d September, to assault the town. The attack was most brutal and bloody. Two men were sent to pieces, and died almost immediately; a crippled old woman of 80 received a deep cut; and from fifteen to twenty were more or less wounded; among these were several children, for the sepoys in their fury made no distinction of age or sex. The civil and military authorities immediately intervened, and the most energetic steps were taken to discover and punish the delinquents.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 6.

The last accounts from Manipal state, that no Intelligence had been received of Dr. Richardson, and that some alarm was beginning to be felt on his account.—Bombay papers inform us that the crop of the present season of Opium does not fall short of 20,000 chests, and that the remaining crop of the last year is 50,000; in all, 70,000 chests, (even if the British Government would not touch the drug,) to be thrown into the ports of the Siam Chinese nations, by force.—There appears, at length, some prospect, that the affairs of Siam, the mismanagement of which the Natives of Western India consider a stain on the English character, will be brought to an equitable termination. Sir James Carnue and Mr. Anderson have procured to the spot, to investigate, weigh and decide.—The Editor of the Bombay Times, who succeeded the late Dr. Brennan, has been obliged to resign his post. He was teacher in the Schools of the Native Education Society, and Professor in the College, and the Committee of that Society considering it incompatible with the performance of his collegiate duties that he should edit a newspaper, called upon him to make his election between the two situations; and, consequently, abandoned the paper.—The Englishman informs us, that he has learnt from a quarter that can be depended on, that the Court of Directors is about to dispatch a flotilla of steam boats, adapted to the wants of the Bengal Government, both as passenger and vessels of war.—A large force is to march against Kurnool, a refractory State in the south of India.—A Hindoo gentleman of sporting notoriety, having recently an altercation with an officer in the army, sent him a challenge. We learn from the Harkara, that the officer preferred the acknowledgment of his error to the acceptance of a challenge, which might have compromised his dignity.—A new era of great interest, and involving large property, is now before the Chief Native Court. It is between a wife and his uncle. The uncle, we are told, has been lying three years and a half in jail, for contempt of the Supreme Court, by not filing an answer.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

The first conviction under the New Act, is reported in the Harkara of this morning. One Kondroo, a notorious character, was detected by a constable in conveying an unwilling goat through the streets. He and his companion were brought to the Police, where a difficulty arose as to the means by which the owner of the animal might be recovered. One of the Police Officers suggested, that the goat should be released, when it would find its own way home; and it immediately ran to the house of one Kaderbux, who was out looking for it. The thief was convicted and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. Thus was justice summarily and effectually done in a case, which, under the old law, would have required the aid of a jury and a petty jury.—A Steamer is to be despatched to Soer, from Bombay, on the 7th proximo; the latest day, therefore, for the safe despatch of letters, will be the 21st of the present month.—A correspondent from Chittagong states, that the town has been recently improved, by the erection of an Episcopal Church, and a Wharf.—Official Intelligence was yesterday received of the flight of Dost Mahomed, and of the fall of Cabul. The objects of the expedition having thus been accomplished, it is understood that Sir W. H. Massingham will return to the Western Provinces, and that he will probably be succeeded by Sir A. Darnley.—The Mechanics' Institute, we are, has advertised for a teacher in the Mathematical and Mechanical Sciences, who, on the receipt of 100 Rupees a month, will be required to give four lectures in the week, each an hour and a half long.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 9.

The papers mention that the model of a new and improved treadmill has been sent out to Sir Edward Ryan; which, it is supposed, will be shortly introduced here. It is so constructed on scientific principles, and may be used as a flour mill, oil mill, saw mill, or a pest mill, at pleasure.—Sir George is to pay a visit to a Joint Stock Bank is now in circulation at Bombay, after the establishment of a Chartered Bank has been authorised by the Home Government; and, stranger still, it meets with support even among those who are about to share in the profits of the Chartered Bank.—It is currently reported that Sir J. Lubbock has been appointed Chaplain to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, which is generally supposed to be the stepping stone to a Bishopric. We also learn that the Rev. Mr. Wilberforce, the son of the great Wilberforce, is to come out to India, as Principal of Bishop's College. He is known to be one of the warmest adherents of Evangelism.—On Saturday last, the Steam Tug Association launched another steamer at Kidderpore. She is commanded by Mrs. H. M. Parker. The Derwentwater Tug, the engines are of one hundred and fifty horse power, and were made by those eminent Engineers, Messrs. Fairbairn and Preston, of Liverpool. They have only recently arrived in this country in the Island Steamer.—The Englishman gives notice, in his note to Correspondents, of a very amusing letter from Lieut. Lumley, in which he says, that "he shares in General Lumley's amusement over the Editor and their Correspondent." We have generally found that such assertions are to be read like witches' prayers, backwards.—We have copied from the columns of the Englishman, the following report of the noble conduct of Mr. Hudson, of the Pilot Service, to which we would direct the attention of the reader. "We have accidentally overlooked for some days past, some particulars with which we have been favoured, connected with Mr. Hudson's exertions in saving the schooner Andaloo, her cargo, ship's company, &c. It is somewhat late in the day to notice the matter, but as we would not willingly be necessary to any act of injustice towards a deserving man, we would be permitted to put Mr. Hudson's conduct on record. Mr. Hudson is a mate of the Pilot Vessel Hope. On the morning of the 18th ultimo, being at anchor in the Casuar Channel, he saw the schooner in great distress, her union down, and people on board waving their handkerchiefs. It was at this time cold tide, with a heavy cross sea, and blowing hard. Mr. Hudson volunteered to board her, for which, permission was readily given him by the Commander of the Hope. He got on board with some difficulty,—found the vessel half full of water, and in a sinking state,—some of the rig had been previously thrown overboard. Mr. Hudson took out the crew and officers, and then returned to the Hope, then returned to the Andaloo,—got the rest of the cargo out, holed and pumped, and succeeded in getting sail on the vessel; but to prevent her going down, he ran her ashore. The next morning Mr. Hudson inspected the leak,—found its locality, and having obtained a carpenter, duly repaired the damage, and floated the vessel at midnight of the 19th ultimo. He then brought her up to Calcutta. For this daring and prudent enterprise, the Chamber of Commerce, (to whom the question of salvage was referred) awarded Mr. Hudson one-third of the net value of the cargo and bunk, a portion of which was assigned to the eight men of the pilot vessel, who volunteered with Mr. Hudson, and who gallantly shared in his perils and labours."

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10.

On the 20th of June last, property to an enormous amount was stolen from the office of some very wealthy salt merchants in Calcutta. Two of the notes have now been traced to a native dealer of the name of Chittagong. So extensive a robbery cannot have been accomplished without a large conspiracy, and we trust the utmost vigilance of the Police will be employed in their attempt to recover the booty.—The Civil Courts throughout the country are ordered to be closed on account of the approaching holidays, from the 4th of October to the 9th of November.—An express has, it is said, been despatched after the 12th and 13th Regiments, which left Barrackpore several weeks ago, ordering them to return forthwith to the ennoblements. One of the corps, it is said, will be sent to strengthen Chittagong.—The July Mail, which was expected at Bombay on the 24th of last month, had not arrived when the last papers came away; but we may confidently expect to find before the close of the month.—Rumours seem to be ripe that Lord Auckland will be appointed Captain General of India; and these rumours derive strength from the fact, that no successor has been appointed to Sir Henry Fane.—The following highly interesting account of the improvement of the Native charkas for cleaning cotton, appears in this morning's Englishman. "A new machine of an extremely efficient but cheap and portable kind, for cleaning cotton, has just been received in this country, by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, from the Glasgow West India Association. It appears, that the defects of the American Sawgin in injuring the staple of all the Indian cottons that were passed through it, have been engaging the attention of the friends of this country at home, and having obtained models of the Hindustani charkas in common use all over the Empire, the same were placed in the hands of Mr. Houlsworth, a practical mechanician, whose works are in the vicinity of Glasgow, with a request, that he would give his attention to the subject, and endeavour to improve on the original device; so as to enable the community to obtain a cheap and efficient machine. This, we are happy to learn, he has succeeded in doing. Mr. Houlsworth made many attempts before he could satisfy himself. At length he has produced a machine, which the Glasgow Association entertain a sanguine hope will soon be put to use in the principal of the Native charkas, as we have just remarked—about the same size—regular in its motion—simple in all its parts and easily understood—may be readily repaired—weighs about sixty pounds, and need not be fixed—can be carried about from place to place at pleasure. It cleans most satisfactorily, and without injury to the staple. Any number of them may, by a connecting link, be united in the vicinity of Glasgow, with any other power; and what, perhaps, is more to the point still, if a number be ordered Mr. Houlsworth will undertake to supply them for the trifling sum of forty rupees (£4) each."

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE COMPARATIVE ADVANTAGES OF EUROPEAN AND NATIVE ADMINISTRATION IN THE NUMBER OFFICERS IN THE PROVINCES.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—There would be but little use in arguing on the above topic to those who consider the subject in the spirit of patronage, or the spirit "of the service," which, I fear, much resembles that of a close and exclusive corporation, when such subjects come under consideration. I know that there are several who object, that every high situation given to a Native, is "a situation lost to the service;" there would be no use in arguing to those of the favoured and exclusive caste, who reason thus; and yet even to them I would put the question, why, when associated with Avaras, (Caucasians and Mundies, to wit,) of the caste to be excluded from objects of ambition; they, in about every case, and in regard to almost every prisoner, confirm the Avaras's sentence. This proves other than that the Natives in question are in judgement equal to, and better than, the acquiescent Judges; and that they have, at least, sufficient energy of mind to control the European mind; even having, perhaps, in some few cases, the honour always due to Eastern Judges, according to the Scriptural Commentary, which says that, "It is probable that the Judges rode on white asses, by way of distinction, as the Mundies, or men of low do, now in Persia." I submit, that the many hundreds who have thus said ditto to their law officers, and also who have never explained against them, cannot consistently uphold the exclusion of Natives from higher employment.

I would observe, that the comparison I institute, does not on one side relate to an average European, and an average Native; but it relates to a European in an average European position, and to a Native who belongs to, and who (within rather wide limits, however) must be provided for. This being almost a necessary condition in the constitution of the present service; and, on the other side, the comparison relates to a Native who need not be taken at hap-hazard, but who might be chosen from an immense field for selection, and who need not be indicted on helpless communities, even one day after it is believed that he is doing more harm than being so exposed and tried in the understood condition, that a Native, when he has once entered the service, must ever afterwards be provided for; and, moreover, the comparison does not lie between a Native and a European, both experienced in the language, habits and social principles of the people; it lies between a Native who has a congenial apprehension of these, even at the time of his presenting himself for ed. fice; and a European, who, after five years' cost to Government at the College, and elsewhere, is to begin an apprenticeship of about ten years—unlike a medical student—on innumerate ailments, but on living and suffering, though uncomprehending, communities, who bleed, and bleed unwarily, under his "prudent hands;" probably, ten years; at the end of which, the European does not give the community the benefit of the experience he has gained at their expense; but either goes to another part of the country, or to Europe or Furlough. Again; the comparison is not between a European and a Native, each of whom is, even while unemployed, in actual service, to cost the Government about 20,000 Rupees at College, or on furlough, or absent on sick certificate, or on urgent private affairs at the Calcutta races, or elsewhere; the comparison is between the Native who costs nothing of the kind, except when actually at his post; and who will, unlike the European, always be at his post; and who will not have interest to get changed so often, that six Judges in six years will sometimes be the lot of a single station; the comparison is between the European to whom all I have above indicated, applies, and the Native to whose employment no such disadvantage attaches; and, furthermore, the comparison is between the Native who may be remunerated, and who may (for any contrary experience,) be kept honest at much less cost than has usually been thought necessary to ensure the integrity of Europeans; and here, respecting the comparative integrity of the two classes, (the favourer and the supporter,) I must repeat the old and unanswerable argument, that the Native, who is fairly tried, by even barely adequate pay and by fair hopes of promotion, or even by justice of promotion in regard to the few situations within their general reach. How (as an example of what I would urge,) can honest men be expected from a Native's functionary, who, after tiding in office for thirty years, sees a situation immediately above him, conferred on the protégé of a gentleman's creditor, a young gentleman's Member, or a lieutenant sent from the Presidency?

There are also some who urge that the Hindoo religion is incompatible with integrity and morality; but as persons of integrity and morality have been found under the worship of Jupiter, Hercules and Cupid, they may be found under the worship even of Vishnu. Though the Hindoo keeps his religion in the hands of the Brahmins, and of the system of caste, he keeps his morality rather nearer to his own morality; indeed, the general morality will depend much on the atmosphere of motives and intelligence with which we environ them. Let us substitute the ambition of office, and of voting in local matters, for the former pride of jewellery and extravagant ceremonial, and provide the masses with primary education; and, further, put into the hands of improvement within this reach; and then, but not till then, will the Natives have had a fair trial. Till then, there may, in contradistinction to the "favoured caste," be termed "the depressed caste."

But to induce good from Native administration, the selection and promotion must be duly systematized: the lower departments must be eradic and schools in the higher; and the latter must excite the former to good; and, finally, I submit that the feet of the ladder of promotion must gradually be brought into the municipalities.

After all, Mr. Editor, the Natives have, at least, a claim to employment under the Government, akin to the claim of the Parser who, (according to Gidley,) when about to be sent up for the starving crew, put in a claim for the first steak that was to be sent from his own body; and their claim should not be lightly rejected in the narrow spirit of patronage, as the Mundies, or men of a close corporation—a spirit which acts not the less strongly, that it may, in many cases, act unconsciously.

The roots of our Government are in water: wherever we create a new object of official ambition to the Natives, we put down a root into mould.

INDIAN MISSIONS.—The students of the University of Glasgow have recently resolved to raise 300*l.* a year, and support a missionary to India themselves. The students of the University of Edinburgh mean to do the same; and we are happy to learn it is under consideration in more than one of the congregations.

* These law-pedants are a great evil: nineteen of twenty amount the judicial cases turn on questions of force, and not of law; and for the nineteen questions of fact, the law-pedants are perforce notified, by their having been generally excluded from office of practical life. I hope also that the Education Committee will not neglect impractical pedants on the department.

THE LUXOR MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—A special meeting of the members and friends of this Society was held in Exeter Hall, on Tuesday morning, the 4th of June, for the purpose of receiving six Christian Refugees from Madagascar. The Assembly was very large, and intense interest was excited by the appearance of the Refugees, and the statements made respecting the persecutions they and their fellow Christians in Madagascar had suffered. The most interesting part of the proceedings was addressed to the Rev. J. J. Freeman, formerly one of the Missionaries in Madagascar, who, besides proposing a few questions to the converts, gave a history of what had befallen them. Our limits will not allow of our giving the entire statement; but what we omit chiefly related to the sympathy the Refugees had experienced at the Cape of Good Hope, and the present deplorable state of Madagascar generally.

"It is now rather more than four years," said Mr. Freeman, "since the direct persecution of the Malagasy Government against Christianity commenced. There had been previous indications of opposition to the ordinances of Councils. But it was not till about that period that the Queen published her edict, making the profession and the teaching of Christianity in any way a capital offence. At that time the prospects of the mission appeared to be highly satisfactory and encouraging. There were about 5,000 children enrolled in our missionary schools, and some few thousands of the natives, including a vast multitude of adults, were also, by their ardent voluntary exertions, acquiring the art of reading, so that many thousands had become capable of perusing the Holy Scriptures, which were in circulation amongst them. Two places of worship had been erected, and were well filled with native congregations. About 200 natives had submitted to the rite of Christian baptism, nearly all of whom were received into Christian fellowship. About 20 meetings for prayer were established by the natives themselves in their respective houses in various parts of the capital and the immediate vicinity. Nearly the whole volume of the Scriptures was translated, revised, printed, and put into circulation; but especially the New Testament and the book of Psalms. In these labours we were abundantly assisted by the kindness of the British and Foreign Bible Society. (Applause.) During this state of things the Queen published her edict, a copy of which has been circulated in this country. At the time of the suppression of Christianity, it was but made a provision of it fell under the condemnation of the severe measures of the Government. Several hundreds of officers in the army were reduced in rank, and the whole of those who had voluntarily acquired the art of reading, and attended our schools, and especially those who had bestowed voluntary pecuniary offerings, were placed under penalties; so that perhaps 2,000 to 3,000 natives suffered at once in consequence of the publication of that edict against Christianity. The first direct measures of persecution fell upon that eminent woman, of whom we have all heard with the deepest feelings of sympathy—Rafaravavy. She had been a convert prior to the suppression of Christianity. Previous to her conversion she was a most devoted idolater. She then became one of the most zealous converts; she obtained one of the largest houses she could in the capital, for the purpose of instituting a prayer-meeting. We have attended there on various occasions. By her simplicity, fervour, and consistency, she became the means of inducing the regular attendance of many to the means of grace. This awakened the enmity of some around her, and three of her own servants accused her in the Government. At that time one of the principal officers had fallen under an accusation by his servant, and he, in revenge himself, had effected the re-issuing of a law by which accusations were not to be laid against masters by servants. When her servants, therefore, laid an accusation against her, the Government could not, even in that unjust land, receive the charge. She was, therefore, merely fined on that occasion, after having been some time detained as a prisoner. Her father, who was not a converted man, filled with indignation against the servants, put them in iron. The moment she was released, her heart cherished a burning desire to become the instrument of their conversion; she obtained a house at some distance from that where her father lived, for the very purpose of having them immediately under her care, direction, and instruction. Her earnest and persevering efforts were devoted to effect the conversion of her servants. There is reason to hope that two of those servants became sincerely converted to God by her means. After this she was again accused, with several others, of continuing to read and pray. They were apprehended, and she was ordered for execution, simply because she retained her profession of faith in Christ. In the providence of God, however, it occurred that that very night, when at the cockcrow the next morning she was to have been led forth to execution, an alarming fire burst out in the capital where she was a prisoner. The confusion became general; the soldiers who had her under guard, and the very executioners, forgot at the moment their duty, and the order for execution remained in suspense—not countermanded by higher authority, unless it was that of Him in whose hands are the issues of life and of death. (Cheers.) Two or three days passed away amidst this confusion, and during that time another eminent woman uttered boldly her sentiments on behalf of Christianity. They were conveyed to the Queen, and upon her head the indignation fell. She was led forth to the place of execution, and there a believer in Jesus, pleading with God for the conversion of her beloved country. Rafaravavy was taken to prison, and for five months was kept in that situation, unable to move a single inch day or night. Five soldiers were appointed to guard the house where she was kept, but even there the desire of converting sinners to God never forsook her. She seized moments for conversing with one of her guards, and there is reason to believe that her affectionate prayers and counsels became the means of saving a heart to God. After suffering this confinement, she was sold into slavery, first in a private house, but as that was not deemed a sufficient disgrace, it was ordered that she should be taken into the most public part of the capital, and there, under the eye of all her friends and relations, sold publicly into slavery. She counted it a high honour to suffer shame for the sake of Christ. But again she was found ere long attending at a meeting for prayer, and a young man was accused of having permitted her to meet at his house. That young man was also prohibited. He had been one of those, and I believe the only one of the Christians, who ventured to attend the martyrdom of the first female put to death. He returned from that scene with a heart prepared to yield his life to God, if called upon to do it. He was the next martyr. (Hear, hear.) He fell on the same spot. He supplicated the executioners, before the spear was plunged into his heart, to allow him time to utter a few words to his soul to the hands of Christ. The very executioners, hardened men as they were, granted his request. He knelt down on the spot where he was to die, lifted up his heart in prayer to God for the Queen, the government, his fellow-countrymen, and pleaded that the Gospel might spread and triumph in that land. There are usually four or five executioners, sometimes more. They were about to thrust him upon the block, and he said, "No," he said, "I have no occasion for this, I have no fear of dying." He calmly prostrated himself on the ground, and his tears transfixed his heart. The Government then sent their officers in the wife of that young man to ascertain who the parties were that had been assembling for prayer at his house; she refused to name them. They then threatened torture; they threatened the pliers that they might place her teeth from the bone. They then brought hounds, that they might catch the several joints of her fingers. She was then scourged, and her nails were extracted. It was more than flesh and blood could sustain, though we have reason to believe that she was a pious woman, and we know that she long concealed the names. It has since been to her a matter of grief that she divulged them. The names were carried to the Government, and the parties were brought under fresh accusations. Rafaravavy was again seized, and also two young men who are here present. Six of them instantly fled from the capital, and passed about 60 miles across the country to the west, to a village where they knew there were many who loved the Saviour. They were welcomed there. A leading man in the district gave them the right hand of fellowship. "Come," said he, "to me. As long as I have food to eat you shall share it with me; as long as I am safe, you are safe." (Applause.) He concealed them there, and his wife, who sits by us, assisted in their concealment. The soldiers came to the house and searched for those who had fled, and especially for Rafaravavy, for she was deemed the leader of this little band, which neither threats nor spears could induce to relinquish their faith in Christ. She was in the house when the soldiers arrived, and there seemed no possibility of escape; but she was concealed behind a piece of canvas which the soldiers did not desire. Her life was thus preserved. The soldiers retired from the village, expecting to find her in an adjoining mountain, where it was known that she and others retired to pray. During the absence of the soldiers they were enabled to escape and find refuge in another part of the country, where they were mercifully watched over. They continued there for a few months, till the determination came of the arrival of Mr. Johns (a missionary) on the coast of Madagascar, in the autumn of last year. Communications were made by means of confidential friends, and as soon as they heard of his arrival they travelled by every possible means of secrecy, and arrangements were made to conduct them to the shores of Great Britain, where they might feel that they could worship God in enjoy liberty. (Loud applause.) Mr. Johns, on his return, found some among our Christian friends at the Mauritius, with a young man there in the Queen's Service, an officer in the army.—(Applause.)—went among his brother officers, and collected in one day 700 sterling.—(Cheers.)—towards paying the expenses of bringing them from the coast of Madagascar. Thus aided, they safely reached the Mauritius, where they found a number of their fellow-countrymen who had formerly been in slavery in that land, and had subsequently obtained their freedom; with those they mingled their prayers and thanksgivings to God. There is reason to hope that in the Mauritius some of those slaves, now freedmen, have become freemen in Christ Jesus. If no other sign of usefulness should appear, there are ten or two of these Malagasy friends who are desirous of going back and labouring among their countrymen and countrywomen who are at present labourers in the Mauritius. Having related all that I need state on the present occasion, I shall have the pleasure of introducing them by name to the Chairman, as the organ of the meeting. Barfavers is this excellent woman who was at the point of death, and in the spirit of a martyr prepared for it, but when God has preserved to this moment. They have all adopted new names, and she has chosen the name of Mary. She has read so much of Mary in the Gospel, that she wishes to have that name herself. The second is Kassidy. Her husband preserved this name when wandering over Madagascar. He remains at the Mauritius to obtain a vessel that he may go and visit the rocks on either side of the Island, that if possible he may reconquer his countrymen from destruction. This young man is Andriamanana. He has assumed the name of Simeon, because he said when he took the Saviour in his arms, "Mine eyes have seen thy salvation." The next is Rasomake, who has taken the name of Joseph. He is a young man of eminent piety. Though he is young he has been looked up to during the persecution by all the friends in Madagascar with the utmost affection and confidence as a wise and prudent adviser. Next to him is a young man Retiarahemba, David; he drank the tanga. The other is a youth Andriania, James; whose father was the means of assisting them to get out of the Island. He felt that whatever might be his duty to the Queen on earth, it was equally his duty to endeavour to rescue that intelligent and interesting youth.—Pat.

Though he spent some years of his life in India (he was son of the celebrated Lord Givens), he might have been seen, when almost eighty, digging in his garden at six o'clock in the morning, in his shirt-sleeves. He married the sister and heiress of Earl Powis, who was descended from Lord Herbert of Cheshire.

By his marriage settlement, a large portion of the Clive property was settled on the second son, Mr. Robert Clive, while the Powis estates descended to the eldest, who resides at Powis Castle, in Montgomeryshire, one of the finest old mansions in the country.—Pat.

FACTS FOR NATURALISTS.—About three months ago a family left Edinburgh and settled in Perth, the husband being engaged to fill a situation in the South Inch Cemetery. In Edinburgh they had a favourite black cat, which no stranger that occurred to the people at the time to use could induce to leave the premises. One morning last week, however, on opening the door, to their great astonishment, they found, scratching for admittance, the identical family puss which they had left behind, and about which they had until that moment received no intelligence. By what mysterious instinct the creature had discovered her way—how she had crossed the sea, or if she had roamed round by the bridge of Stirling, we are entirely ignorant. However, the event is an actual occurrence. Similar instances of animal sagacity have frequently been recorded, and they are certainly curious and deserving attention.—Edinburgh Observer.

MARCH OF INTELLIGENCE IN KENT, AS COMPARED WITH THE BARBAROUS IGNORANCE OF IRELAND.—The following is an exact copy of a public notice.—Not. The Parishioners are requested to meet on Monday next at the church at Ellenwood in the forenoon to pass the Serjeants accounts and choose others.—Widham 6th May, 1839. The above village is near Chatham.—Pat.

COLDBATH-FIELDS HOUSE OF CORRECTION.—An inquest was held on Thursday in the above prison, before Mr. Wakley, M.P., when the Coroner, after the inquiries were concluded, asked whether Mr. Medhurst was put to hard labour, and subjected to the silent system?

The Governor.—No. He was not sentenced to hard labour, and in consequence of the chaplain's recommendation he is furnished with books, and permitted to prosecute his legitimate studies.

A Juror.—Ah! that shows there is one law for the rich, and another for the poor.

The Governor.—Not as regards the regulations of this prison. The Judge did not sentence Medhurst to hard labour, therefore it could not be inflicted here. There is a gentleman in this prison of large property, and who keeps a first-rate establishment at the west end of the town. He was convicted of a misdemeanor and sentenced to hard labour, which he undergoes, and picks oakum as well as the meanest inmate of the prison.—Pat.

THIEVES AND BURGERS.—The following are extracts from the report of the Constabulary Force Commissioners.—An experienced thief deposes, "There are bad of both kinds; for gambling there is nothing to choose, but for 'travellers' there are more jerry-shops than public-houses by many. I know of three jerry-shops started by thieves for the accommodation of their acquaintances. Two at Nottingham in a court. Then at Leicester three, and three at Sheffield. I have been at all these myself. In Sheffield there are five public-houses in a street not 200 yards long, and every one a resort for thieves, men and women." In Halifax two public-houses and a jerry-shop, all open to the 'travellers.' In Manchester six in one street, viz., four jerry-shops and two public-houses, all receptacles for thieves, and one public-house in another street. In fact, in all parts of the country, and in all towns, there have been a great number of jerry-shops started by thieves to get the custom of 'travellers.' 'Travellers' spend more money at such places than other customers, oftentimes drinking and gambling all day. I think the jerry-shops have done good to the brewers, but nothing but harm to other people, except thieves. It's easy enough to begin one. There is not a licensee, and about 80 more will set them up in every thing. The first week will pay this outlay in general; there is generally a dinner given gratis, and drink is paid for. In these places it is that 'work' is planned, and they are what are called a 'plan,' or places for 'planting' things &c. &c. hiding places. I know that there are brothels in Manchester, Rochdale, Halifax, Huddersfield, Nottingham, and indeed in all towns.—Mr. R. Gregory, a large farmer at West Ham, in Essex, says, "The great source of evil is the beer-shop. You are sure to find the robbers connected at beer-shops. When I took my farm there was no beer-shop; one was set up, and the difference seen in the working week before and after was such as no one would conceive. I had hardly lost any thing before that by my own people's dishonesty, and now I was obliged to watch them every way. They would take my fowls, and get there and have them smoked, &c. &c. opposite my farm-yard. They would cut the hearts out of my cabbages for the same purpose. I once went with a parcel and took one half boiling out of the pot. I took the man and the cabbage to Lambeth-street, and then it was found on the table and his brother had been plundering in a larger way; and they were both transported." The same witness says, "The prison I succeeded had been very much plundered by his servants. The men engaged upon the farm premises would get up between twelve and four o'clock in the morning, while the farmer was asleep, and help themselves to every kind of produce. Most of the plunder was regularly disposed of by the carters at the different watering houses on their way to the London market. They, almost as a matter of course, they sold their horses' carts, and much that should have been part and parcel of the produce they delivered to the different salesmen. The general plan was for them to put the things into cellars, or boxes left opened on purpose at these houses, and as they returned they were paid for what they had left by the owners at the side of the road."—Christian Advocate.

HOW TO DEAL WITH OWENISM.—We copy the following sensible remarks from the Social (not Owenite) Gazette.—The New Moral World, a Saturday publication, price two-pence, printed at Birmingham, which is the accredited organ of Owenism, has a circulation, so we are informed, to the amount of five thousand copies. Other cheap publications are put forth from time to time; while emissaries, "who lecture as they go," are dispatched to different towns as London, Edinburgh, Lancaster, Leeds, Coventry, Preston, Hull, &c., and every where. These "Social Missionaries," as they call themselves, give glowing accounts of their successes, and report discussions and controversies, in which, according to their own showing, they are always conquerors. Among these teachers of Owenism, a lady obtains honourable mention. By these proceedings some Christian philanthropists are alarmed. We can hardly be of the number. The faith which has triumphantly withstood the roughest shocks of tyranny and persecution, and ridicule,—the dangers and the sword, and the wild boasts of the amphitheatre,—emperors and their legions, scholars and their reserves, wits and their jests, the elaborate attacks of Paine, and the polished rilleries of Voltaire, has not much, we think, to dread from Mr. Owen and Mrs. Martineau. Yet, if the facts be as they are stated, they must result either from internal or from external causes. We must suppose they would seem to prove one, or both, of the things which we proceed to notice. Either there must be some shadow at least of right and reason in some parts of this scheme of Socialism; or there must be some evil in some parts of our present social condition, so great and pressing, that men would fly from them to any scheme which holds out a prospect of mitigation or cure. We believe also, that some partial truth exists in the many of the poisonous ingredients of Owenism; that in his four grand departments of inquiry, Mr. Owen enunciates some general and speculative, some practical and economical propositions, which, separately considered, are just, and useful, and feasible. We believe, too, that the co-operative principle, properly understood and applied, as well as properly combined with that which is individual or competitive, is destined to exert a great and beneficial influence upon the future condition of the human race. Clubs, proprietary schools, benefit societies, joint-stock companies, combinations and associations of countless descriptions, offices of insurance, most especially of mutual insurance, with many commercial and some banking establishments, are exemplifications of this principle; moreover, this system of Socialism is, in all its good parts, a plagiarism from that very creed which it would crush and exterminate. This love of peace, this hatred of drunkenness and intemperance, this tender care for children, these exhortations to charity,—whether they be sincere or but pretended,—whence have they been learnt but from the religion of Jesus Christ? This Association of all classes of all nations, "which, in the hands of the Owenites, is only a puerile chimera, or a piece of sentimental banishment,—what is it but a travesty of sublime truths, that we "should love our neighbours as ourselves," that "all men are brethren," that the whole human family is one? Now, if these positions are correct, we may draw from them certain inferences which may not be unprofitable. They may teach us either to let Socialism alone, that it may die of itself, and perish of inanition for want of funds; or, if it is to be opposed, they may teach us how best to oppose it. The best way of opposing it is perhaps not to be found in those public lectureships, where almost all turns upon the individual qualifications of the dispenser, and a praetised talker may make the worse cause appear the better; in those challenges and controversial meetings which may lead to irritation and disturbance, without leading to any definite or conclusive result; or even to the agitation which Mr. Owen and his followers avowedly desire; and certainly it is not to be found in sweeping, indiscriminate, wholesale abuse:—the best way is, we conceive, to look well, with a direct view to immediate and practical remedies, at those social evils imbedded in our present condition, which induce men, impatient of their actual distresses, to rush into the arms of any scheme that holds out negligent promises of advantage or relief; those evils, the enormous causes of sad effects, through which alone, theories like Mr. Owen's can ever take a firm grasp of the popular imagination, or secure to themselves vitality even for a week; and again, to analyse the system, to decompose its elements, and carefully to winnow the good from the bad. For instance, we are not to renounce our abhorrence of war, our recommendation of temperance, our advocacy of infant schools, because Mr. Owen is happy to be so; we are not to desert the cause of the "poor man's union," and abjure; but, in throwing away the two portions, we must retain the sound; because, as we have said, they properly belong not to Owenism but to Christianity.—*Christ. HOURS OF LABOUR AND INSTRUCTION OF FACTORY CHILDREN IN PRUSSIA.—A law has been passed and published in the State Gazette by the Government of Prussia for the regulation of the hours of labour of children and young people, the details of which must be interesting to all persons engaged in manufacturing pursuits, as well as to the Legislature of this country, in which measures for the improvement of the Factory Act have been pressed on the Government for some time past. The law appears to be simple and effective for its object. The employment of children in manufactories, mines, &c. at workshops of any kind below the full age of nine years is strictly prohibited, nor are they to be employed at all before the full age of sixteen, unless it shall be proved by a certificate regularly attested by the schoolmaster, that they have attended and pursued their studies for three years regularly beforehand, are able to read with facility in their native language, and conversant with the first elements in the art of writing. There is no exception to this regulation, except in cases where the masters or manufacturers have themselves established schools close to their manufactories. It is moreover provided, that no young people who have attended the school for three years shall be permitted to work more than ten hours a day, although in special and particular cases (du force majeure) by which the regular march of business has been interrupted, the local authorities are empowered to sanction a prolongation of working time, but to the extent of one hour only per day, and for a period never exceeding one month. These special cases refer doubtless to the occasional stoppage of the works by accidents to the machinery, which require a total suspension of operations for the purpose of repairing, as for example, where a mill is moved by water power and it is stopped for a time by a deficient supply of water. On such events it is perhaps but fair that consideration should be had for the employer, who may have orders on hand, as frequently happens, to be executed within a given time, the non-execution of which would entail damage, and even lead to the ruin of his business. In such foreseen cases the young workpeople are to be allowed one quarter of an hour, and at most an hour, for recreation. They are not to commence work before five in the morning, nor must the hours of work be prolonged past nine o'clock in the evening. They are prohibited from working at all on holidays and Sundays. The Christian workpeople, who have not their first communion, are not to labour during the hours fixed for religious instruction. The remainder of this legislative enactment consists of a scale of fines and penalties, more or less severe, upon manufacturers or employers who shall be found infringing any of its provisions. The former laws, for obliging children to attend the schools, are also to remain in force.—Fat.

HUGHES MARET—DUKE OF BASSENO.—The late Duke de Bassano, Count Hughes Bernard Maret, was born in 1758 at Dijon. He entered with enthusiasm into the first revolution, was the first publisher of the Bulletin de l'Assemblée, and when M. Peacock established the Monitor Universel, he was appointed by him as its editor. He knew Napoleon well when he was only a Lieutenant; and, becoming Chief of the Division in the Foreign Office, was sent to England after the 10th of August, 1792, to secure the neutrality of the British Government; but was sent back immediately with M. de Chauvelin, the French ambassador. In 1798 he was appointed ambassador to Naples; but being made prisoner by the Austrians, he was detained till 1799, when he was released, and sent back to France with the Marquis de Seneville, in exchange for the daughter of Louis XVI. He afterwards became private secretary to Napoleon, who frequently, it is said, joined him in composing articles for the Monitor. In the year 1811 M. Maret was created Minister of Foreign Affairs and Duke de Bassano, and in 1812 he signed the treaties with Austria and Prussia, preparatory to the expedition against Russia. The events of 1814 sent the Duke back into private life. On the return of the Emperor, he resumed his previous functions, became a peer, and was nearly taken prisoner at the battle of Waterloo. On the second restoration he was banished from France, and retired to Grafton, where he occupied himself with the education of his children. After the revolution of July he again returned to his native country, and was again made a peer of France. On the 10th of November he was appointed Minister of the Interior and President of the Council, but his ministry, as we well know, existed only three days. The funeral of the Duke was solemnised on Wednesday morning at the church of Notre-Dame de Lorette. Among the numerous persons who attended the ceremony, were several of the ministers, and the diplomatic body, the Dukes Deuasse and De Broglie, and Messrs. Charles Dupin and Menouier, who were pall-bearers, together with deputations from the Peers and Deputies, and the Institute. The Duke's body was deposited in the family vault at the Père la Closerie.—Id.

ROBERT HALL AND HIS FATHER.—The following characteristic notices of the illustrious Robert Hall and his Father are taken from an amusing volume, "The Life, Book of a Labourer: By a Working Clergyman," which we observe noticed in the London papers of June.

ROBERT HALL OF AGENCY.
"In one of the cottages where I happened to rest myself, I had the great good fortune to light upon a very aged but intelligent man, who had a perfect recollection of old Mr. Hall—his "sliding, weekly wife"—young Mr. Robert, of Leicester, and of other branches of the family. It is almost needless to premise that he 'was a Baptist; had belonged to that community more than forty years.' I was touched with the reverential and affectionate manner in which he alluded to his former pastor. 'We, never knew his worth,' said he, 'till we felt his loss. Ah, Sir, he was a CALVES, he followed his Lord fully.' I observed, too, with pleasure, how decidedly the old man referred the ministrations of the older Mr. Hall, to those of his better known and more popular son. 'You have heard of him,' said I, 'Mr. Robert Hall,—the Leicester Hall I mean,—frequently?' His celebrity was great as a preacher.' His father—he replied gaspingly—'was a great preacher. Yes! he was a SEARCHING preacher. To my mind Mr. Robert never equalled him. His sermons were too wide. He never pinched the conscience as his father did!' And his mother?—said I—curious to learn whether the theory embraced by many clever men being indebted for their brains to clever mothers, could in this instance be supported.

"I knew her well. She was a weak, silly, ailing woman; but remarkably kind and clever: and had a readiness of utterance, and an ability in expressing herself which remained with her to the last. Her closing hours were very happy. 'And had she then been for some years a widow?' 'Yes! I'll own she was sudden. He died in his kitchen. I was with him on business an hour or two before he was summoned home. He was then as cheerful and hearty as I had ever seen him. He had written—or was intending to write that very day—to his son Robert. Ah! his thoughts dwelt on that young man. They are together now. Yes! they are together now.' "And how did she spend her gentlemanly leisure? Was much of his time bestowed on the education of Robert?' 'No! He liked a bit of land; carried on himself the farming business till his son John was old enough to take it off his hands. He was a good judge of cattle; and had a rare knowledge of land, its quality, and what it would produce. But his gift—his gift, you understand me—continued he inquiringly—was that of a preacher. He would pound away at a sinner's conscience till he was unable to feel all his conclusions. The conversion never had his equal, and never will."

ROBERT HALL OF LEICESTER—IN THE PULPIT.
"One of the recollections which I should be loth to lose, which I should glory, above all others, to preserve fresh and uneffaced, is the memory of a sermon I heard him preach at Kettering, in the summer of 1824, on 'The Resurrection.' The scene and the auditory were alike singular. The building was crowded almost to suffocation. It contained men of all creeds and parties; the grave and the gay; the bold and the timorous; the Quaker and the Episcopalian. It was curious to observe the air of evident disappointment on the face of several of his hearers as he commenced his sermon. Their look of surprise and concern spoke as plainly as look could speak—

"Here is some awful mistake! This feeble, hesitating, speaker can never be the eloquent Mr. Hall!"

"He began in a very low tone; several laughed and dispirited; thought repeatedly; gave you the idea of a speaker who felt quite uncertain whether he should be able to proceed; and paused at frequent intervals, painfully, to draw breath. His friend, Mr. Jacob, told me that two hours sleep was the whole he had had on the preceding night; and that, passing the remainder of it lying on the floor, perspiration had more than once rolled profusely from his brow with the intense agony of his complaint."

"Well might he appear exhausted and depressed!"

"Presently he warmed with his subject. His voice assumed a deeper, fuller, rounder tone. All hesitation vanished. Period after period of elegant argument, pathetic intensity, and painted illustration, held his various auditors in unbroken and delighted attention. As he proceeded, one after another of the congregation rose with the aid of the subject, style, and argument, till at the conclusion, half of his audience were standing, in rapt and spell-bound admiration of his powers."

"The breathless silence of many seconds which succeeded, was to my mind a marked and affecting tribute to the solemnity of the subject, and the absorbing eloquence of the man."

"When Robert Hall was in the meridian of his powers, he was announced to preach in one of our churches for some fund connected with the Baptist denomination. Being then in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, I hurried up to London expressly to hear him, and arrived early in the morning of the day he was to preach. With some effort I succeeded in reaching the chapel, and after a struggle obtained standing-room. I was well repaid. A more splendid effort of human intellect was never witnessed by a delighted audience. In the evening he was to preach in a different and distant part of the town; and taking an early dinner with my friends, I pursued him. He surprised me when he commenced by stating that owing to severe illness and very limited notice, he had not been able to prepare himself as he could have wished; and that therefore some of his audience would probably hear that night the same sermon which they had listened to in the morning. I fancied I was better able to enter into his varied and varied sermons, than upon his first delivery. But what struck me clearly, forcibly, and lastingly, was this—that all the force, passion, in the sermon—the appeals, the peroration, the application, were word for word the same as he had uttered them in the morning. The conclusion which I then arrived at was this—that Hall did not preach ex tempore; that he did not preach from memory; in other words, that he was a preacher ad gratiam—confident in confidence; hopeless for other men to reach—alone and unsurpassable!"

THE SAME IN THE PARLOR.

"But if his eloquence as a preacher was great, and his style as a writer nervous and noble, most captivating were his conversational powers. Of them I can give only one or two instances. They are far from conveying anything like an adequate idea of the power, wit, and readiness of the man."

"To the doctrines held by the Millenarians, when mentioned in his presence, I remember he gave neither assent nor rebuke. He appeared disinclined to enter upon any controversial discussion of the subject; but upon the eternity of Heaven, he made, as I conceived, a memorable and striking remark. Would that I could record it with the fire, force, and fervour of the speaker?"

"Sir, in the perpetuity of Heaven, on which you would repose. If the Deity, had decreed me that I should be a dweller in the heavenly temple for any limited period, how long soever it might be, still if it had an end, it would not be heaven! My thoughts, Sir, would take wing beyond it. I should be continually harassing myself with the conjecture of what was to succeed beyond the end. I should feel that, though distant, there was an end. This, Sir, would mar to me all the melody of heaven. Its music is in vain. Once in the heavenly temple, thence the saint goes out no more for ever."

"Some one spoke of the income offered up to wealth, rank, and power; and this led to a remark on the idolatry paid by some to wealth, and by others to influence. 'Sir, there is an idolatry worse than either, the idolatry of intellect. That, Sir, may yet ruin this great country. Look at the flagitious private character of some of our rulers. Hear the people burghling them as if they were more than mortal. The language is paid to the intellect of the man. The viciousness of his character is forgotten: a handsome distinction in the sight of One who is of purer eyes than to behold idolatry.'

"I have the greatest aversion, Sir, to Eulogism. I hold it to be unscriptural. But the activity, worth, and gentleness of Dr. Hyde have done more to reconcile me to it than all the arguments of the Toulmin school of divines."

"The name of a certain nobleman, whose influence has placed him prominently before the public, was mentioned; and some one styled him 'a selfish sensualist.' Mr. Hall exclaimed:—'Sir, that is a prejudice! Where will you find a sensualist otherwise? Scandalously, Sir, first harshens the heart, then contracts it; the slave of the adulterous Drusilla, hoped that money would have been given him for Paul's release; was disappointed in his object; felt persuaded of the Apostle's innocence; yet left him bound."

"Sir, I object to your ritual, but I admire your lyrics. The first I hold to be in more places than one irreconcilable with Scripture. The last I conceive as perfect as any man could make it. One petition it involves, embracing in my mind the very essence of Christ's teaching, and breathing the language of Christ's spirit—that it may please God to have mercy upon all men."

TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

"The accumulation of property—which had he published more freely would have been within his reach—seems at no time to have entered into his calculations. I remember to have heard that Mr. Cumbe, of Leicester, proffered him five hundred pounds for eight single sermons to be given to Mr. C. at intervals most convenient to Mr. Hall's health and leisure. The offer to many men would have been tempting, but was instantly rejected. 'Sir I couldn't do it. I wouldn't advertise myself to such a price.' The next month, in commencing my tour, I told you that I knew from Mr. Hall's own lips that advantage was offered him twice made him, had he felt disposed to quit the ranks of Dissent, and conform to the Church of England. The latter of these two overtures came from Bishop Barrington during the period he held the see of Salisbury. His characteristic comment on these offers ran thus—'I wouldn't have been more useful in the Church of England, but I would have been more honest.'"

From the same old man, with whom he conversed about his father, he learnt the following particulars respecting the early days of the son:—

"Among other matters let me ask you, is the metaphysical tailor still living?"

"Now you pose me. I thought my recollections about Mr. Hall were pretty clear. But here I'm at a loss. A tailor? I remember no tailor connected with the son. What could you mean?"

"A metaphysical tailor, by way of distinction. He lived in my time. Those who knew Robert Hall well, have more than once told me that, when alluding to his early life and education, he was accustomed to say that he derived much of his knowledge of metaphysics and all his love for them from a tailor in his father's shop who had made some progress in that science; and with whom, in his boyhood, he had spent many a happy hour. I told you that some one of Mr. Hall's letters he alluded to in his metaphysical companion and to the arguments, particularly on religious subjects, which he used to hold with him."

"Arguments? oh! now I recollect him perfectly—a talkative, noisy, little body, clever in some respects, and very useful in dispute. Subtle was he as a serpent! He would win and win about you never knew where you had him. He used to confound most shamefully when it suited him, flatter which it was, and truth with falsehood. Well! well! He knows which is which now! He has been dead this many a long year."

"But did he live to see his former pupil in possession of the celebrity which he used to anticipate for him?"

"He did not. But to his dying day he always declared that Robert Hall would prove to be one of the greatest men the Dispensations ever had. Pious!"

"The score with which the old man uttered this memorable, and the air with which the old man took a pinch of snuff after it, would have done credit to a critic of metropolitan pretensions."

"Robert Hall," he resumed, "was extravagantly fond of his Cider. Down here when he would, one of his first visits was to the old friend, the argumentative tailor, who had him a warm preference. The root was one of bitterness; and the fruit he was gall."

"Now," said I, "you pose me. It is my turn to call for explanation."

"Soon given; but painful: Did you never hear," said he, drawing closer to me and speaking in a kind of whisper, "that Robert entertained in his earlier years a kind of very peculiar notion—in fact, that his religious views were strangely mixed with—with—what philosophers call materialism?"

"I have understood as much."

"For that point 'his firm belief he was indebted to that apple-tongued tailor. I don't know what you mean by metaphysics; but to my mind that tailor was about what of a free-thinker. He had no clear view on any one subject. It was all cloudy, shifting, shadowy-like. And yet 'twas so amazing to hear him argue. Say what you would you couldn't rattle him!"

"You should make large allowance, then, for the attraction which a youth of Robert Hall's grasp of mind would feel towards his society."

"But it grieved his father. Often when he remonstrated with Robert, and would speak to him boldly and plainly—for he was a man of strong, useful, every-day sense; and this beating about the bush suited him neither in precept nor practice, in the pul-

THE DUTIES OF GOVERNMENT IN REFERENCE TO CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS.—The Calcutta Christian Observer has published a rejoinder to our reply, in the last number, which will be found among our selections. The spirit which it breathes, is certainly not that which is best adapted to the discovery of truth; and the style is any thing but courteous. But these are minor considerations, which ought not to draw off attention from the important question on which we are at issue with our contemporary, whether it be the duty of Government to establish schools with the distinct view of converting Native youth to Christianity. The writer endeavours to turn upon us our own observation, that the examination of historical records had made sad havoc with the pledges which were supposed to bind Government to the support of idolatry, by drawing the inference, that the pledge of Government to abstain from proselytism, is equally unfounded. It is a fact, that those who defended the rite of Suttee, and the existing alliance between Government and the shrines of idolatry, affirmed, that in both cases pledges had been given, any departure from which would be a violation of the national faith. We were enabled to show, upon indisputable testimony, that no such pledges had been, or could have been, given. The Editor of the Calcutta Christian Observer would seem to argue, that because the British Government is not bound by any pledge to the support of idolatry, it is not pledged to refrain from official attempts to convert the Natives to Christianity. On the contrary, we affirm it as a fact, that Government is pledged by solemn, voluntary, and oft-repeated engagements, not to use its power for the propagation of Christianity. Upon the sanctity of these assurances, the Native mind reposes with confidence; and any effort which might be made to throw the resources of the State into the scale of proselytism, would justly be regarded as a violation of those engagements.

It matters little what are the means used for the purpose of proselytism, as long as the end is manifestly, and intrinsically, the same. If the Natives are enabled to trace a distinct design of conversion in the public measures of Government, the effect on the national feeling would be the same. For all practical purposes it would be the same thing, if Government were to endeavour to convert the Natives through schools, as through chapels; if it should employ the school masters, who are recognized as Government agents, to propagate Christianity, as if it should employ the Darogah to assemble the people to hear a discourse delivered by a Missionary, paid by the State. Those who employ Missionary funds in the support of schools, must do so under the impression that the schools will become nurseries of the Christian Church. If they supposed that their schools would not produce a powerful Missionary effect, they would not spend a farthing of Missionary money on them. It is such schools which we think Government cannot, consistently with its oft-repeated engagements, patronize.

If, however, Government had not pledged its faith to refrain from attempts to convert the Natives, there are other reasons which would make such a course highly questionable.

Its immediate effect would, we fear, be the almost entire desertion of the schools. Not only would no Christian knowledge be imparted, but the opportunity of giving any knowledge at all would be, in a great measure, lost. Whatever may be said respecting the propriety of leaving the great bulk of the people of England in the darkness of ignorance, unless secular knowledge be blended with spiritual, under the direction of the Established Church, there can be no question, that in this country secular knowledge is better than no knowledge at all. Here we have to disturb the sleep of ages; to awaken a spirit of enquiry, which has lain dormant for two thousand years, and more; and the imperative necessity of making such exertions, is not weakened by the idea, that the aroused faculties of the Native mind may not, in the first instance, be directed to religious enquiries.

Supposing, however, that Government could succeed by compulsory measures, in securing the unwilling attendance of students, is it wise to provoke that spirit of political hostility which this would not fail to enkindle? Would it be the dictate of prudence to spread a feeling of mistrust through the length and breadth of the land, and to accustom the people to look to the termination of our government with feelings of desire? In our humble opinion; whatever endangers the stability of our administration, must be highly inexpedient in a Missionary point of view, because the continuation of our present facilities for Missionary operations, appears to be bound up in the continuance of the British power in India.

Upon these grounds, besides those of principle, we have advocated a strict neutrality, as far as Government was concerned, in matters of religion. We take it up as an Indian, not as a sectarian question. We examine it in reference to the peculiar circumstances of the country. We think neutrality the only path of prudence and safety; because any deviation from it, would be sure to defeat immediately the object for which it was made; and ultimately to endanger the existence of our means of doing good, by putting the Government itself in jeopardy. On the other hand, we have equally opposed the countenance given by the officers of the State to the shrines of idolatry, as a violation of that neutrality which Government professes to have adopted.

Some may consider it difficult to reconcile this doctrine with those animadversions which we have felt it our duty to make on the very sceptical direction which the Board of Education have given to some of its measures. But is it not possible to act on principles of neutrality, without leading the Native students to imagine,—and this has too often been the case,—that the exclusion of Christianity from the public schools was more a matter of delight, than of duty? Was it not possible for the Education Board to have adopted a dignified neutrality, without pouring contempt on Christianity? or leaving on the Native mind the impression, that they had quite as little regard for Christianity, as the Heathen themselves? We allude more particularly to the contempt with which the Committee ordered the books of the Religious Tract Society to be kicked out of some of the public libraries, at the time when they were open to the reception of the Bhaktas and the Korans. This was a work of supererogation, which we trace up to individual predilections and prejudices, and not to a general sense of public duty. Perhaps it is too much to expect that all the members of this Board should be equally impressed with the value of Christian truth, or that they should lament, in an equal degree, the necessity of refraining from attempts to impart the highest and noblest instruction, in order to promote public objects of an inferior description.

But there is a large field of exertion still open to them; which though not directly of a Missionary character, cannot fail to prepare the minds of the people for a purer faith. The founders of the Hindoo system have, happily, combined secular with religious error in the same system, and given the same sanctions to both. All those errors in astronomy and geography; in natural philosophy, in history, and in short in every branch of human knowledge, by which this country has been brought to so degraded a condition, are as much part and parcel of the Shasters, as the belief in the gods and brahmins, and in the transmigration of souls. And it is impossible to shake a belief in one part of this compound system, without, at the same time, preparing the mind to examine and to reject the rest. The reception of secular truths does, therefore, indirectly, but powerfully, pave the way for the admission of divine truth. This secular knowledge, Government is at liberty to impart, without the violation of any pledge. The Government seminaries may, therefore, perform a very large portion of that work, which the Missionary would find it necessary to do; they may clear the ground of noxious weeds; they may prepare the soil; and then the good husbandman may sow the immortal seed of the divine word. The Calcutta Christian Observer remarks on the subject:

"Has intellectual education the effect of destroying Hindoo superstition? If so, does Government give such education, knowing that fact? Is this neutrality? the fulfilment of 'solemn, voluntary, and oft-repeated engagements?' Does the 'Friend of India' defend such a system? If so, what is the difference in this matter between us, but this: he uses one method, a literary one; we would another, a Christian one, to attain a given end. Is not this a difference of degree, not principle, on the 'Friend's own theory? though there is a difference of principle besides."

This is not a fair representation of our sentiments. It is not just to say that we recommend a "literary method," to destroy Hindoo superstition, while the Observer would use Christian weapons for the same purpose. We advocate Christian Missions for the subversion of Hindooism, as zealously and as sincerely as our contemporary. But while we think that the 'Christian method' may be legitimately employed through the agency of Missionaries, we think it is not available through the instrumentality of Government. We rejoice that intellectual education has a tendency to eradicate Hindooism; and that Government may legitimately patronize it to the largest extent, without violating its pledges, or even compromising its neutrality. Government does not impart this intellectual education, with the view of destroying Hindooism; but with the view of raising and improving the moral and social condition of the people; and the collateral effects which flow from it, though not unknown to Government, are to be ascribed to the short-sightedness of those who have so welded intellectual and religious error in the same system, that no alchemy can separate them.

If, in the discussion which has now, we trust, been brought to a close, any expression has escaped us, which may be considered as arising from a feeling of indifference to the objects of the Calcutta Christian School Book Society, we beg to recall it. The Society proposes to itself a most important sphere of labour. We may differ from its supporters in considering that Government is not to be censured for a conscientious adherence to its pledge of neutrality, but we unite with them in regarding every school in which the truths of Christianity are taught as a real blessing to the country; and we consider the Society which aims to supply them with suitable books, an institution, without which, our Missionary plans would be incomplete.

THE PROBABILITY OF A BURMESE WAR.—Various have been the conjectures relative to a Burmese war in the ensuing cold season. Hopes and fears have alternately risen and subsided, and risen again. The capitalist has been looking onward to a new five per cent. loan; and the neglected four per cents. have fallen to four, five and six per cent. discount. The merchants have been looking out for the Declaration, to bargain for freight and transport service. The army has been looking forward to the acquisition of fresh laurels, in a field which has already witnessed the triumph of British valour; but we have approached the season for operations without any effective demonstration. Not many weeks ago, the exercise of guns boats in Calcutta, the arrangement for transporting a European corps from Ceylon to Rangoon, and the sudden order issued to the general service corps to proceed forthwith to the Presidency, preparatory to embarkation, seemed to give indication of approaching hostilities; but the general service corps are suddenly ordered to remain fast, and the hopes of war are down at zero. For our part, we are inclined to believe, that however desirable it may be to occupy the Delta of the Irrawaddy, and thus to complete the chain of our post office arrangements by land between Hmaw and Penang, there will, after all, be no war at all this season.

First; because the season of preparation is over; and no rapidity of combination would enable our armies to complete the subjugation of the country in one campaign. A Burmese war, which should be dragged out to a second campaign, is a thing never to be thought of. It would entail the necessity of sending out a second Lord William Bentinck, to pure down the 'services,' civil, military, medical and ecclesiastical. As our troops could not, therefore, reach Ava before the rains of 1840, we do not think they will be sent on a Burmese expedition in the winter of 1839.

Secondly; when the question of a second Burmese war was first mooted, Tharrawadde had just gotten possession of the throne of Ava, as Dost Mahomed before him had obtained Cabul, and began to talk big about his own importance in his own Court, and contemptuously about the treaty of Yandaboo, and the Governor General. But circumstances have altered since that period, both in the East and the West. It is now distinctly ascertained, that the Usurper is infinitely more afraid of us, than we can possibly be of him. Not only has he no idea of attempting the recovery of the territory we wrested from his predecessors, but he deprecates a war with the English, as the last of calamities. He knows, that in spite of the hundred thousand rusty muskets which the Burmese Government has acquired since the peace, his raw recruits would stand no chance with the disciplined valour of British troops. If the idea of an English invasion is whispered in Tharrawadde's ear by the Portuguese lad whom Col. Burney took up with him to Ava, and 'who enjoys Tharrawadde's confidence, yet sleeps like a dog in some outer chamber of the palace by night,' the Usurper loses his rest. But with all his instinctive dread of British prowess, the King feels that the presence of a British Minister at his Court is a national disgrace, and a galling obstruction to the cruel indulgences of oriental despotism; and he burns to enjoy the same independence which the King of Siam, the Emperor of Cochin China, and the Lord Paramount of Eastern Asia, the Emperor of Peking, enjoy. He has, therefore, been endeavouring to feel his way to this much cherished independence; and while he has contrived, in his own barbarous fashion, to keep the letter of the treaty, he has broken its spirit. He has admitted the British Minister with his fifty men, and refused all intercourse with him; and he has done every thing, short of open violence, to make Ava too hot for him. We will candidly confess, that at the time when Tharrawaddee's designs were believed to be unequivocally hostile, we advocated the indispensable necessity of forcing the residence of an Envoy on him; but, considering the pacific turn of the Usurper's mind, we are almost disposed to think, that the residence or non-residence of our Minister is scarcely worth a war, which most cost us millions, and entail a series of boundless miseries on the Burmese. We believe that Government is now fully convinced, that Tharrawaddee will not go to war, if we do not press the question of a Resident; and if the barbarian were at all open to the influence of political argument, he might plead that, after we had shown our indifference to the necessity of a British Resident at his Court, by neglecting to send one for three years after the treaty, we could scarcely be justified in going to war with him for having delivered the Burmese Court from his presence.

Thirdly; we are inclined to think, that since the usurpation of Tharrawaddee, the plot has thickened so rapidly in the West, that Government would gladly compound for peace in the East on honourable terms. In the present aspect of affairs, Government will require some deeper provocation, than the dismissal of Col. Burney, to warrant a war on the eastern frontier, which must exhaust the public finances, and distract the attention of the public authorities. The period appears to have arrived, which the prophetic eye of Napoleon foresaw, when he predicted that the civilized world would, at no distant period, be called to take up arms to prevent a Universal Russian Despotism. The crisis has at length turned up, in which enterprises of larger moment even than those which the French Revolution brought on, will shake society to its centre. Western Asia is again about to become the theatre of grand enterprises. The events which have this year transpired in Afghanistan, are connected with a circle of movements, of which Constantinople is the centre, and the Indus one of the extremities. To our minds, the best justification of Lord Auckland's acts, is to be found in the Russian demi-official declaration, that if he had exhibited less energy and decision, the path of Russia would have been abundantly simplified. But we will not break a lance with the Herkules on this subject. The wisdom, or the folly of the Afghan campaign, depends on European movements. This, however, we may say, that the magnitude of those interests which have arisen in the West, have necessarily disposed Government to peace and economy in the East.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORT OF IDOLATRY.—The Calcutta Christian Advocate informs us, that, before long, the most positive orders may be expected, from the highest authorities, to dissolve at once, and effectually, all Government connexion with every shrine of idolatry. We hope the information may be correct; and it would be an additional gratification to have the authoritative mandate before the next mail leaves. It would then be in time to allay the provocation, which must be deeply felt, when the news reaches England of the exaction of the pilgrim tax, at the late festival of Juggunath, before it has time to do harm. The habit of patronizing idolatry seems to be peculiarly inveterate. The Bombay Gazette of the 2d instant contains a letter from Surat, which describes the celebration of the coconut festival in that city, in these terms: "Coconut day has passed off here in its usual way, only Government is said to have kept it on the wrong day, which some of the Bramhuns and Banyans say, is very inauspicious for this ill-fated city. I have heard it asserted that Government took no part in the ceremony. Facts, however, seem to show the falsity of this assertion. Where is the ceremony performed? In one of the offices of the Adawlut. Who, besides Natives, are present? European Ladies and Gentlemen. Who pays for the cocoanuts, &c., used on the occasion? Who defrays the expence of the Sankrit prayers said to the river on this auspicious day? Who orders out the vessels to manoeuvre up and down the river, firing salutes and displaying their colours? Who orders the guns (about 100 during the day) to be fired from the castle, and from the vessels in the river? I should suppose the Government or its agents do all this. Till within the last three or four years, the Agent for Government used to throw the consecrated cocoanut into the river; but during Mr. Sutherland's judgeship it was transferred to the Nivrah." We hope such indecencies will be looked into, and prohibited in future.

BRIDGES.—By the letter of our Correspondents, The Inhabitants of Tribene and Nyuserai, it will be seen that the good offices of Mr. Samuels and Mr. Walters have obtained for them, from the Court of Directors, the reconstruction of their bridges. We are glad to find that the public convenience is so provided for—and especially that the Honourable Court have thought good to conciliate the confidence and affection of the people by so acceptable a boon. It seems private enterprise will not leave them the opportunity, of conferring, on the metropolis and its neighbourhood, the much more important benefit of the Floating Bridge that has lately been talked of. In this there is no cause for regret, but much the contrary. Governments, like a still higher Power, are usually most inclined to help those who help themselves. The more, therefore, that is done by the public spirit of the community, the more we may expect will likewise be done for the community by the State. As however Government may feel a little annoyed that so beneficial and popular a measure has been taken out of their hands, we would beg to suggest that there is a subsidiary gift which it is still in their power to bestow. Let them throw a suspension bridge over the Baloo Khali, half way between Seranpore and Howrah; and then by the help of the floating bridges, the whole population on this side the river, from Houghly, Chinsurah, Clundernagura, Seranpore, and their dependencies, will have a direct road into Calcutta, to the great advantage of the district, and the extended usefulness and support of the proposed bridges. We cannot profess impartiality on the subject: for an uninterrupted road to Calcutta, or even to Howrah without the floating bridge, would be a convenience to us, and our neighbours of the greatest importance. As it is, how adverse soever the tide, wind, or stream may be, we can make no use of our own carriages or horses. In expediting our journey to or from the City of Palaces; nor can any be kept for general hire.

EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVES IN THE MAGISTRACY.—We publish another letter from Casandra, on the employment of Native agency; and a communication from Phildino, respecting the peculiar stress which we have laid on the employment of European agency in the reformation of the Police. We have always advocated the appointment of Natives to offices of trust in the public administration, and we consider that nothing is so calculated to give our Government a deep root in the country, as the liberal system which has latterly been introduced. At the same time, we cannot but think that the reform of the Police will be most effectually accomplished by European agency. So deep and inveterate are the habits of bribery and extortion among the Native Darogahs, that we scarcely think any augmentation of salary would be sufficient immediately to eradicate them. The evils of our Police system are so portentous, as to demand an instantaneous and vigorous remedy; and it is from European agency alone, that we can look for an adequate remedy. But another, and even more serious objection to the employment of Natives exclusively, is, that the people of the country would have no confidence in them, however well they might be paid. Confidence, as Burke observed, is a plant of slow growth, and it will be long before the people come to repose that confidence in Native Officers of Police, as to consider them in the light of friends, and cheerfully to give them their assistance. Unless the confidence of the people can be acquired to such an extent, that they shall be led to aid and abet, instead of thwarting, the Police, the detection of those who prey on the Native community will be a matter of no ordinary difficulty. In the European, the Natives do generally repose that confidence which they refuse to their own countrymen, more especially when the European condescends to appear amongst them, without his Native satellites. We, therefore, advise the employment of European, in preference to Native agency, in the present emergency. It is quite as necessary that Government should take the field against the Dacoits, as it was that it should organize a system for the suppression of the Thugs. Under our inefficient Police system, crimes have increased to such an extent, that no man any longer considers his property secure. There is no leisure for experiments. We must resort to the agency which has been found effectual in eradicating evils of a kindred character, and of equal magnitude. When Dacoity has been eradicated from Bengal, (and we think Major Sleeman might effect it in about five years,) then will be the time for establishing an improved system of Police, which shall embrace a large portion of Native agency, upon an improved plan, both of allowances and responsibility.

X THE SUMACHAR DURPUS AND THE PRINCE RAJAH OF BURDWAN.—Among the charges brought by Mr. Shaw, the attorney of the soi-disant Rajah of Burdwan, against Mr. Samuells, is, that he purchased and distributed a number of copies of the Sumachar Durpus, in which paper it was stated, that it had been clearly established, that the prisoner was Kistno Lall, and that Mr. Samuells had, at length, been appointed 'full Magistrate of Hooghly. Mr. Samuells has appealed to us, whether, with that, or with any other article which appeared in the paper, he had any thing to do. We cheerfully come forward to affirm, that during the whole period in which the trial was in course of publication, the Editor had no communication directly, or indirectly, with Mr. Samuells, except where the papers were ordered. It was not till after the first part of the trial had appeared, that he requested thirty copies of the journal to be sent him. Nor was he singular in this; other individuals, both European and Native, obtained copies for their friends; and so great was the eagerness of the public at that time for a report of this strange investigation, that it became necessary to publish a second edition of the number in which the trial first appeared. The remark regarding the identity of the impostor with Kistno Lall, arose from the Editor's own reflections on the evidence. The appointment of Mr. Samuells to the Magistracy, was noticed, as other Civil Appointments are noticed. Nothing could be more innocent, certainly, than the purchase of thirty copies of a paper which contained the report of a trial, which has excited as much interest in Bengal, as perhaps any single event which has transpired since the battle of Plassey.

THE DOCTRINE OF JEHOVAH ADDRESSED TO THE PARSEES: A SERMON, BY THE REV. JOHN WILSON, D. D. &c. &c. &c.—This singularly interesting discourse was delivered partly on the 1st of May last, when Dhunjoobhy Nowrojee was baptized, and Hormadjee Pestonjee renounced his adherence to the faith of Zoroaster, and partly on the close of the proceedings in the Supreme Court, which arose out of those occurrences. The occasion was one which has riveted the attention of Christians throughout India. It will have as powerful an effect in Europe. And Dr. Wilson's elaborate discourse is every thing that could be wished, to satisfy the curiosity, to deepen the sympathy, and to sanctify the whole impression, which the reception of the first fruits of the Parsees into the fellowship of the Christian Church cannot fail to create. Generous feeling would be dead indeed, if the Parsee race, so distinct and curious a remnant of antiquity, and at the same time so intelligent and enterprising a portion of modern society, did not, when placed before the eyes of the Christian Church, draw forth much earnest prayer and effort for their conversion to God.

Dr. Wilson's sermon, however, was intended primarily for the Parsees themselves, and not for the Christian Church. Its great purpose is to bring out distinctly, the doctrine and practice of the followers of Zoroaster, that they may be called, as it were, to answer to their own consciences for adherence to such errors and absurdities, and feel the opprobrium of being known in the enlightened society in which they move, as professing their belief in puerilities so foolish, and tenets so irreligious and mischievous.

In a preface of seven pages Dr. Wilson gives a valuable memoir of the history of the Parsees since they came into India, their present numbers and distribution, and their looks of sacred authority. The Sermon itself is founded upon Isaiah xlv. 5, 7, 8: I am Jehovah, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hadst not known me. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace and create evil: I Jehovah do all these things. Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together: I Jehovah have created it. A slight acquaintance with notions of the Parsees will be sufficient to show how peculiarly happy has been the selection of the text. It places before us, as if intentionally, the main points of contrast between the faith of Zoroaster and the doctrine of revelation. But before proceeding to the exposition of his text, Dr. Wilson, in the introduction of the sermon, gives us another historical notice of still greater interest than that of the preface. In this he exhibits what may be called the collision between the faith of Zoroaster and the gospel, from the time of its first promulgation to the present day. And both of these notices are so valuable and instructive, that we shall place them both entire amongst our selections.

In the words of his text, Dr. Wilson shows, that the Parsees have a sort of national inheritance. They "were originally spoken to by Cyrus, the king of the Medes and Persians, about a hundred and sixty years before his appearance on the scene of his kingly greatness. They convey instruction suited to all the sons of men, but especially to the devotees of the Persian faith, which, though greatly modified in many of its rites and ceremonies, remains, as far as its essential principles are concerned, nearly in the same state in which it was in the days of him to whom they were addressed." The doctrines of the text are brought out in the order in which they occur, and severally put in contrast with the Parsee faith. I. The speaker calls upon us to recognize him as the self-existent, eternal, independent and unchangeable God: I am Jehovah: but instead of this first principle of all religion, the Parsees believe in a pantheism little differing from that of the Hindoos, in which every attribute is denied to God, unless it be mere existence. II. Jehovah demands exclusive recognition as the Divinity: There is none else, there is no God beside me. But the Parsees, though they do not worship idols, are as determined and devoted polytheists as the page of history reveals to us. They worship seven Amshaspands, a multitude of Iads, the five watches and other divisions of time with-bounds, time-without-bounds, the five elements, and a variety of other objects, natural or mystical. III. Jehovah intimates the speciality of his providence: I have girded thee, though thou hast not known me. Whereas the Parsees have committed every province of nature to the care of the Iads and Amshaspands, and so followed the other heathens, who, in their wisdom becoming fools, "have thought that they have exalted God, when they have represented him as not himself deigning to uphold the constitution of the universe, and to direct the works of his hands, and have attributed the government of the world, and the guardianship of the various departments of nature to subordinate duties and powers." IV. Jehovah declares himself the immediate author of the most glorious symbol of his own nature, by emphatically saying, I form the light. This creature of God, however, is still the great object of Parsee worship. V. Jehovah declares himself to be the immediate author of what has been often viewed as the emblem of evil: I create darkness. The Parsees ascribe darkness, and whatever they take to be evil, to Ahriman, the spirit of evil, by whom the creator, Hormazd, was opposed in all his works, his paradise being marred by winter, his flocks by flies, and so forth. VI. Jehovah declares himself to be the author both of peace and evil: I make peace, and create evil. And VII. Jehovah declares himself to be the source of justifying righteousness, and sanctifying grace: Drop down ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness; let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together, I the Lord have created it: Which Dr. Wilson considers a prophetic description of the blessings of the Gospel; and thence closes his discourse with a summary of evangelical truth, in contrast with the poor, and frequently ridiculous, expedients by which the Parsees endeavour to overcome the difficulty of man being just with God.

Under each of these propositions there is conveyed a quantity of information respecting Parsee doctrine or worship. Our limits will not allow of our attempting to transfer that information to our pages; but the preceding analysis will enable our readers to understand, what they would obtain by becoming possessed of the sermon itself. They will find it equally worthy of regard as an exhibition of divine truth, and a contribution to literature from a little known but highly interesting field. As a composition it is every way worthy of Dr. Wilson's reputation. The style is pure and vigorous, and the tone calm, persuasive, and benevolent. It is an eminent favour that has been bestowed on Dr. Wilson, that he should have been made the first, in modern times, to bring the Parsees to a knowledge of the unsearchable riches of Christ. We hope he may yet see many more converted to God, besides the two interesting youths who have already made a good confession before many witnesses.

MISSIONARY CHURCHES.—Although it is in Scotland, the greatest progress has been made in bringing Missionary exertions into a scriptural relation to the Churches of Christ, the change has also begun in England. As yet it has chiefly been developed in the Provincial and Country Associations of the Independent and Baptist Churches, and in reference to Home Missions. We are not acquainted with a better example of these, than the Lancashire Congregational Union. This Association has been in existence some thirty or forty years, and has been the means of raising many of the Congregational Churches, with which Lancashire is furnished, and from which no small proportion is drawn of the funds annually raised for the various purposes of Christian benevolence at home and abroad. From one of the Churches so raised, no less than £4,500 was lately obtained for the erection of the new College in Manchester. The Missionary income of the Union last year was £1,500: a sum with which a vast amount of good may be done in a country. According to the Rules of the Union, which are now before us, it consists "of Churches of the Congregational order, situated in the country and its vicinity;" its main object is the diffusion of Christianity, in connection with Congregational principles of church government, within the county and its immediate vicinity; and the means adopted for attaining that object, is the promotion of the preaching of the gospel, by the support of Evangelists, and the assistance of Churches requiring pecuniary aid. The affairs of the Union are conducted by: General Committee, consisting of Delegates from the Churches, together with their Pastors, the Tutors of the Academy of the county, ministers of the gospel without a pastoral charge, but residing in the county and elected to membership by a general vote, and, what is particularly worthy of notice, of the Evangelists employed by the Union. These pious labourers, therefore, take part in the councils of the whole body, and occupy the place of brethren, and not of servants. It is taken for granted, that their experience, and devotedness make them, at least, as fit as any others, to advise on what is good to be done for the common cause. They are not made to feel the stigma of an inferior grade, or taunted, as it were, with the intimation of dependence and subjection. The General Committee meets, for the transaction of business, once a year, alternately in Manchester and Liverpool: but the operations of the Union are more closely and constantly watched over, by subdivision of the Committee into four District Committees, having each a fourth part of the county under their immediate superintendence. Each District Committee sees to the collection of funds amongst the Churches within its bounds, watches over the stations occupied by the Evangelists of the Union, and inquires into the wants and claims of new localities, and reports on the whole to the General Committee.

That, however, which first drew our regard to the Lancashire Congregational Union, is its mode of proceeding with the Churches that are raised through the ministry of its Evangelists. We became acquainted with it originally in conversation with a worthy minister, the pastor of one of the Churches, which the Union first planted and still assists: and he had had reason to appreciate the system under which he was going forward in his work. His account was afterwards confirmed to us by several of the chief members of the Union, with whom we had the pleasure of frequent communication. When a new station is selected, where no Congregational Church exists, a Missionary is sent to occupy it by the sole appointment, and at the sole expense, of the Union. As soon, however, as his ministry becomes effectual, and a sufficient number of converts are gathered for union in Church fellowship, they are requested to organize themselves as a Church. They are then desired to choose for themselves a pastor, according to their own inclination. The Missionary who had brought the gospel to them is open for their choice; but if there is any other minister of consistent doctrine and character whom they prefer, there is not the slightest force put upon their inclinations. The Pastor of their choice is obtained amongst them; and the onward minister and people are left uncontrolled, according to the principles of Congregational independence. The Church is called on to contribute, according to the ability of its members, for the support of its pastor, and whether the contribution be little or much, it is made up from the funds of the Union to the amount of income previously allowed to the Missionary. The usual course is, that the sum raised by the Church increases every year, until nothing is required from the Union at all: and then the Church, still increasing, becomes at length a grateful contributor to the general funds of the Union, from which it first received the Gospel. Under this system, independent vigour, generosity and zeal are diffused through the whole body; and the Union goes on increasing in extent and usefulness from year to year.

The same minister who first explained this system to us, had been before employed under one of a different character. He had been sent as a Society's Missionary to Ireland. The rule of the Society who employed him there was, that, when a Church had grown so as to be able entirely to support its minister, it should be at liberty to do so, and be then left to perfect independence in the management of its own interests and discipline: but as long as it came short at all of supporting its minister, whatever it did raise for the purpose was to be incorporated with the funds of the Society, and the minister was to receive his salary wholly from those funds, he considered the servant of the Society, and be entirely subject to the Society's directions respecting the scene and course of his labours. Our worthy informant assured us, that such was the paralyzing influence of this system, that, although the Society had been carrying on its operations for many years, not a single Church had yet been raised, by its means, capable of standing alone. The system had so pressed upon himself, that he had withdrawn from the service in disgust. He had occupied a station for several years, and had enjoyed a satisfactory measure of success. A Church had been raised wholly through his ministry, and between its members and himself a strong attachment naturally had been formed. The prospect began to appear distinct, and not very distant, of his people being able to secure his continuance with them by wholly undertaking his support. But in the midst of his pleasant dreams of a settled abode, with progressive usefulness, amongst the flock which he had gathered into the fold of Christ, he was awakened to the bitterest disappointment by a sudden mandate from the Society, to leave his station, and go to occupy another at a distance from it. The command was peremptory; and he had no option but to obey it. When he reached the place of his new appointment, he found that he twined his removal, and all its vexations, to the good opinion the Society had formed of him. In fact the previous occupant of his new station had thrown the Church under his care into utter confusion, by an unwise contention respecting weekly or monthly communion. The station was in danger of being broken up, and our worthy friend, having shewn himself skilful in building up a Church, was sent, without explanation or question, to prevent that mischief. The indelible impression made upon his mind was, that the more faithfully and successfully he laboured, the more unlikely was he ever to take the place he coveted, of an independent Pastor of a Church he loved. At the same time the Church—in Society-nomenclature it was merely a station—from which he had been torn, had its spirit broken by the arbitrary removal of their minister, and the obstruction of a stranger in his room, and the good work in it was stayed. In Lancashire we found him labouring in hope and cheerfulness, and rejoicing in the changed character of his ministerial relations. His tale produced a very powerful effect upon our minds, and more than any thing else, perhaps, occasioned that train of observation in which these papers have originated.

The Congregational or Independent Churches throughout England, are generally united in Associations for mutual encouragement and assistance; and of late years, the institution of Home Missions by these Associations within their own bounds has become nearly universal, so that the propagation of the gospel at home, at least, is thus far recognized to be the proper work of the Church. Having begun, like the Lancashire Union, to follow this scriptural course, its manifold advantages are leading to its rapid extension. For larger objects than the County Associations could undertake, as is supposed, a Congregational Union of England and Wales has lately been formed, of the constitution and aims of which, we confess, we have had our misgivings. Be that as it may, as a sort of national Synod, it now holds its annual session, and is certainly working towards good. On the 6th, 7th and 10th of May last, it met in London, and received Delegates from Wales, Scotland, and America, both from Congregational and Presbyterian bodies: for where the Jurisdictions of the Presbyterian order cannot call on the civil power to enforce their decrees, they differ but very little from Congregational Associations. The sentiments fostered by the Congregational Union may be understood, from the following notice of a speech by the Rev. John Blackburn, on the subject of Home Missions, which was received with frequent applause.

"For his own part, he thought every congregation ought itself to be a Home Missionary Society. The gifts of every church should be called forth, and the whole body should, as it were, move simultaneously. If this should be the effect of their proposed meeting, a great moral impression would be made, and vast spiritual benefits would succeed. (Hear, hear.) The churches in London had great cause to bless God that they had adopted the plans of the Christian Instruction Society. Those churches had now 50,000 families under visitation. (Hear, hear.) His object in mentioning this, however, was not to boast of what they had done, and are still doing in the metropolis, but only to show to the brethren in the country, what benefits might be expected to result in other parts of the kingdom, if a similar plan were adopted. He was very sanguine on this subject. Aye, he believed that some of them would live to see the time when the churches of Christ would do their own work, and no longer delegate it to any central institution. (Cheers.) With respect to the question before them, he thought it of very great importance that some efficient plan of home missionary operation should be immediately adopted. (Hear, hear.) That they should employ lay agency as well as stipendiary agency, that in fact they should have a Congregational Home Missionary Society. They had neither the one nor the other, to the extent required, under the Home Missionary Society."

A proposition had been made, on the part of the Congregational Union, to the Home Missionary Society, to meet for discussing the subject of Home Missions, with the view of combining, if possible, their efforts for that cause. But the proposition was rejected by the Society, chiefly on the ground that many persons who were not Dissenters had been its warm supporters. On this, the Rev. J. A. James, of Birmingham—than whom for piety, wisdom and authority, none more worthy can well be named of the Congregational body—expressed himself thus:

"He was exceedingly sorry that the door of communication between the two bodies seemed to be closed by the recent act of the committee. (Hear, hear.) He could not agree with the last speaker as to the best friends of the Home Missionary Society not being Dissenters. Why it was well known that the resources of the Home Missionary Society, with the exception of a few bequests, were furnished by them—(Hear, hear.)—and it must be distinctly understood, that if that Society refused to co-operate with them, and they formed another by union amongst themselves, that other would be entitled to their support. (Cheers.) They must support themselves. (Hear.) He therefore did hope that the brethren of that Society would take into consideration whether it would not be their policy and their wisdom to co-operate with the Congregational Union."

These are not idle threats. The Union adjourned its proceedings to a meeting in the present autumn, at Birmingham, for the purpose of then originating a scheme of Home Missions under its own direction. The unanxious Society for the same purpose, will, doubtless, either be merged in this new system, or fall away to nothing.

The Congregational Union have likewise put their hand to foreign work. The Colonial Missionary Society, of the Annual Meeting and Report of which we gave a brief notice, on the 8th of July, at page 451, was instituted under its auspices, and is adopted as its own: and the operations of the Society are conducted in harmony with the avowed principles of the Union. Missions to the Heathen have not yet been taken in hand. But as Mr. James forewarned the Home Missionary Society, so the London Missionary Society has been admonished in the Congregational Magazine, that the time is drawing nigh, when it must drop its pretensions to all comprehensive Catholicity of constitution, and not only admit the fact of its dependence for pecuniary support on the Congregational body, and the general adherence of its agents to that order, but conform its economy to the principles and constitution of the body which maintains it. The wedge is in, and some day soon it will be driven home.

WEEKLY EPIITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 12.

The report that Government was about to relinquish the monopoly of Salt, which grew out of the reduction of the manufacture last year, is disproved by the increased exertions which, it is said, are to be made this year; the manufacture in the 24 Pergamals is to be increased from three to eight lakhs of maunds.—A Commission of Lunacy, held in the Supreme Court House yesterday, declared that Bagram George Bagram had been of sound mind, without lucid intervals, since July, 1837.—Fresh proofs of the utility of the New Magistrate Act crowd on us. Yesterday a Native servant was brought up for robbing his master, and before the clock struck two, was under sentence of conviction to a month's imprisonment. A Grand and Petit Jury under the old system, would have prolonged the man's slavery to three months.—Act XXII. of the year, just published, extends to prisoners charged with offences before the Supreme, or any subordinate Court, the provisions of the Act of Parliament which alters them the benefit of counsel or attorney in all cases of summary conviction. The phraseology of the Act is, we think, justly censured, for it is not certain whether the benefit of counsel is to be given before, or after, conviction.—Dorjeeling begins to rear its head under the able management of Dr. Campbell. He is said to be "just the man for a new settlement." Like Themiastolus, he seems to have the art of making a little town a great one. A series of rules for the new Sanatorium, which breathe a liberal spirit, was published in last night's Official Gazette.—The new treaty with Seide, which has been made through the efforts of Col. Poltinger, it is said throws open the whole country to British enterprise, and guarantees, in the fullest manner, the friendship of the Amers for ever. The best guarantee for the continuance of this eternal friendship, however, is the occupation of the Indus by our steam flotilla.—The Court of Directors have expressed their entire approbation of the separation of the offices of Accountant and Auditor for the Western Provinces, from those of the Lower Provinces. Those offices are to be located definitely at Agra, and it is even rumored that the Sudder Board and the Sudder Court at Allahabad are to be removed thither, a matter of more questionable expediency.—The French frigate, the Dardogne, which has just arrived in the river, has on board Monsieur Brisson, an aid-de-camp of the Governor of Bourbon, deputed by the French Government to endeavour to introduce the cultivation of silk into that island.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 13.

The last Calcutta Lottery, which it was calculated would yield fifty thousand Rupees, yielded only twenty-two thousand.—The Agricultural Society has received notice to quit its chambers in the Town Hall, as the building has been made over to Capt. Fitzgerald, to undergo a thorough repair.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. John Moore, of the firm of Moore, Hickey and Co., who, after a residence of twenty-one years in India, and after struggling with many difficulties, was preparing to return to England this year, with a moderate independence.—The question of the Floating Bridge, or rather the Steam Ferry, appears to have been taken up in right earnest. Mr. Taylor, to whom we are indebted, in a great measure, for the post office reforms, now of the firm of Carr, Tagore and Co., has proposed the formation of a Company, to carry the project into execution. Nothing can be more easy or more advantageous.—A Native, employed at the Bank of Bengal, has just made off with the sum of 4,000 Rupees; the offender is not captured.—The Banks of the new tank, in Wellington Square, have, in several places, given way, and it is now discovered that it was dug in the bed of an old creek, which the Courier says ran from Baitakhana to Chaudpaul Ghat, and there emptied itself into the river. This creek terminated at Colvin's Ghat, which was formerly called, from that circumstance, Kacha Goodas Ghat.—Letters from Penang state, that the Captain and part of the crew of the Manchester, which sailed from Bombay on the 15th July to Liverpool, had arrived there in the long boat.—The Bishop of Calcutta proceeds on his triennial visitation in a Steamer, on the 23d of October next.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14.

All our hopes regarding the July Mail have been disappointed. The Bombay dawk, which has been detained for a day, has come in without it. The conjecture at Bombay is, that the communication through Egypt may have been interrupted by the blockade of Alexandria; but so important an event would certainly have been announced to India by some vessel sent express. In all probability, the Falmouth packet may have met with some mishap.—Mr. Frederick Osborne, of the Calcutta bar, and late Editor of the Courier, has just left Calcutta to try his fortune at the Madras bar, where the retirement of Mr. Cator, from one of the most lucrative offices of the Court, will make room for fresh hopes.—A very important change has been made by Government in the examination of rent-free tenures. Rule X. of the Circular Orders of 1837, which directed that if the deeds were declared by a competent tribunal to be forged, no length of possession should be considered as giving a title to lands, has been rescinded, and those who have been aggrieved by it are directed to be reimbursed.—Since the occupation of Cabul, the post has come on with regularity through the Khyber Pass and the Poonjah. Letters of the 16th of August were received in Calcutta on the 11th; a most palpable and important improvement.—Capt. George Thomson, of the Bengal Engineers, to whose professional skill the fall of Ghiznee, and the termination of the campaign, is mainly to be attributed, has transmitted a full account of the capture of it to his superior officer, Col. Macleod, who has kindly sent copies of it to all the newspapers. It is distinguished by that modesty which always accompanies true merit.—The Madras papers have discovered a job. Orders have been received, it seems, to re-establish the Mint at Madras; and yet, notwithstanding the order, H. M. S. Conway has been sent up from Madras with twenty lakhs of Rupees, besides what she can pick up on the coast for recoinage. Of course the Madras papers are not over hasty when they pronounce that this most extraordinary step has been adopted for the purpose of giving somebody the per centage.—Yesterday being the anniversary of the death of General Martine, the founder of the Martineer, the Bishop of Calcutta preached a sermon in the chapel of that Institution.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16.

The Englishman of this morning appears in a new broad sheet, of larger dimensions than the Herkara; the one containing 1,360 square inches; the other, 1,368 inches of letter press per sheet.—Government has addressed a letter to the various officers at all settlements and stations in India, requesting them to note accurately the different phenomena which may occur during the continuance of storms and hurricanes.—The Joudhpore expedition has started; on the morning of the 27th ultimo, the town of Palee, which has been rendered famous by the plague, was taken possession of. Marat fell the same day, and Pindwarral was about to be invested.—Sir Henry Seton, in the Insolvent Court, on Saturday last, pronounced the opinion, that the Court had no jurisdiction in cases in which debts were not contracted in Calcutta; this opinion, however, is considered to be inconsistent with law.—The triumphant termination of the expedition to Cabul has had a very visible effect on the value of Government Securities. The four per cents, which had fallen to six per cent. discount, are again looking up. The conviction that a war with the Burmese is far from inevitable, and that Government will not, therefore, stand in need of a loan, has also produced a happy effect.—The Bombay papers have published a list of the passengers who are engaged for the Suez bound Steamers, during the next four months.—The Governor of Bombay has returned from Sattara in greater haste than was expected. It is said that the visit has left no favourable impression on his mind, as troops were immediately ordered to hold themselves in readiness.—A fourth attempt to sell the Government Cinnamon Gardens at Ceylon has failed; few attended, and no one bid; this is ascribed to the heavy and impolitic export duty of three hundred per cent. which is fixed on it.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17.

An application has been made to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, on behalf of the Ranees of Boplaun, Bugeet Koomaree, who is kept in confinement by Fran Baboo, the guardian of the young Rajah, in such a wretched hotel, that the Surgeon of the station writes, that "we should be pushed to be blamed, if our prisoners were kept in such a state."—Intelligence has been received from China to the 1st of July. The Imperial Commissioner has issued two edicts; the one requiring all foreigners to proceed to Canton, and all ships to return to Whampoa in five days, or to quit the country altogether; the other, demanding of the Portuguese Government the surrender of a Chinese converted to Christianity, who was said to have been engaged in smuggling Opium, failing which, the Commissioner threatens to besiege Macao with twelve thousand men.—The Ariad, which was sent from China to Aden with intelligence of the Opium crisis, reached that place in twenty-four days from Java Head, and took on to Suez the Bombay Mail, which left that port in the Constance, on the 30th June, and was forty-one days in making Aden. These news from China direct has reached Aden in fifty-one days earlier than the same news sent by way of Bombay.—Intelligence has been brought to Bombay by the Hugh Lindsay from the Persian Gulf, that Ibrahim Pasha, after defeating the troops of the Sultan, had advanced to Konia; that the Sultan himself had died at Constantinople, and that the Russians were in full march on that city; and that a fleet was moving down upon it.—The Governor of Bombay has suddenly returned from Sattara: It seems that he found a cordon of troops drawn up round it; and that the Rajah refused him admittance, on the ground that he was in treaty with the Court of Directors, and would not treat with one of their servants.—Mr. Ross Bell, the able Civilian who was sent to Siliakapore to manage the political relations of the English in that quarter, has thrown up his appointment, having found it impossible to act with Brigadier Gordon.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE FRIEND OF INDIA AND THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY.

To the remarks in the Friend of India (August 6th) in regard to the C. G. S. B. Society, our reply is short, and we trust not too keen even for Serampore.

Proffered courtesies we cannot but reciprocate.

The matter of "personal esteem" we must of course leave editorially unclaimed.

The charges of "sensitiveness," "violence," "torrent of abusive imputation," and "fery denunciation" we leave to their fate with the hebdomadal name of the great suppressor.

Why does not our "Friend's" quotation of scripture extend to the matter, as well as the manner of the controversy. Does the Bible speak more clearly on the latter than on the former?—or, are we nearer the truth in the former than in the latter?

We still express our astonishment, not at the novelty or antiquity, but at the fact of the Friend of India's hasty statement. The opinion of the Observer as to India, is the opinion of the Dis- senters of England, as to England, at this very moment:—they are glancing National Education on the basis of the Bible. This the Friend of India knows:—would his readers think he did?

"The sturdy dissenters" of former days has not been doubted, and could not have been unknown. What we doubted was this,—whether the Fathers of Serampore would have assailed the infant Christian S. B. Society in the manner and on the grounds on which the Friend of India has done?

Rise intellectual education the effect of destroying Hindoo superstition? If so, does Government give such education, knowing that fast? Is this neutrality? the fulfillment of "voluntary, and oft-repeated engagements?" Does the "Friend of India" defend such a system? If so, what is the difference in this matter between us, but this: he uses one method, a literary one; we would another, a Christian one, to attain a given end.—Is not this a difference of degree, not principle, on the "Friend's" own theory? though there is a difference of principle besides.

As to "Government pledges," who writes in page 400, first column, line 17, of August 6, 1839, as follows? "What real havoc has the examination of official records made with the pledges, which were some time since set up as scarecrows to frighten Government from the propriety of leaving Hindoo temples to the management of the Hindoos themselves!" Turn over the page and see!

If the "Hindoo College system" leaves its young men "without moral sense or principle," what will the Government system do? Is there any difference in principle or in practice between them?—The Hindoo College is "a school of scepticism" but if so, then every school of the same kind, deserves the same name:—and why not call it, "God-less and Christ-less," as well as "school of scepticism?"

We have now followed our respected and elusivous Friend round the lists; although we have been able to fresh nothing but a back-thrust. The Knights of Serampore were wont to present the front, were they not?—We trust, after this, we shall hear no more of "rash intemperance" and "low antagonism;" of "abusive imputation" and "fery denunciation!"—Ed.—Cul. Christ. Observer.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Your readers will, no doubt, be glad to hear, that the Court of Directors have sent out orders for re-building the Bridges at Tribenue and Nyasaree at the public expense. The Government is taking proper measures to execute this order, with as little delay as possible. This is as it should be. You will recollect, Mr. Editor, that upwards of 3 years ago, we, the inhabitants of this neighbourhood, petitioned Mr. Samuels, the Magistrate of this district, to apply to Government to put up these Bridges. Mr. S. with a public seal very seldom equalled, strongly recommended our prayer; and Mr. H. Walters, then Com-members of Council, supported the recommendation. You, too, Mr. Editor, kindly advocated our cause in your valuable Friend of India. The Government referred the matter to the Military Board; a few influential, but stinging members of which, set their mighty powers against us, by declaring that there was no necessity for those Bridges; but such was the perseverance of Mr. Samuella to secure this public convenience, that he personally spoke to the Government Secretaries, and wrote several letters on the subject, until Mr. Ross was induced to report favourably to the Home Authorities for their construction. Thanks to God we are now secure from the short sighted policy of the Military Board; but we must not forget our benefactors in time of joy. Then, Mr. Editor, we hereby publicly and sincerely offer our heartfelt thanks and deep obligation to Mr. Samuella, by whose exertions chiefly this blessing we have gained, and we are sorry that he is now absent from us; a circumstance much deplored by the whole of this district. We must wait for a long time before we can get his equal. Then our obligations due to Mr. Walters, now in Europe; and, lastly, to you, Mr. Editor, for the share you have taken in this affair.

We remain,
THN ISHANTANTS.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have read your able paper on the want of reformation in the present system of Police. On this head you will find that few disagree with you; but, Sir, I observe that you lay particular stress on the employment of European agency. Now, the only Europeans that would be available at this time, every Officer being wanted with his corps, would be the same description of men that are now being employed as Deputy Collectors, under Reg. IX. Trust me, Sir, their work in that capacity is not so far superior to their Native brethren, as to make every one think, as you do, Pay a Native well, raise him in the scale of respectability, and he will not fail you; apply the same rule to him that holds good with regard to every nation under the sun, make it a man's interest to do his duty properly, and he will do it. The incentives are not few. I think Natives are just as capable as ourselves of the value of honour, or respect money, or the hope of advancement. Out of more than 30 that I know employed as Deputy Collectors, I have never heard a single whisper of their corruptibility. Why should they be more so? Give them small districts, a kind but vigilant superintendent, (I mean vigilant with regard to the manner of exercising their official duties) and they will not be found wanting, at least so thinks,

Your obedient servant,
PHILLINDO.

P. S. There must surely be at present a number of well educated men in Calcutta, who would be ignorant of the present ways of extortion, and more acquainted with our system of morals, by which, as we consider it purer, of course, every man's character must be tried.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Allow me, not in a controversial spirit, but in all respect and amity, to offer some remarks on your remarks of the 1st inst., respecting a change from the irresponsible to the responsible system of municipalities, from the hereditary and stationary to the elective and progressive principle.

Let me first premise, that the change must be made very gradually and discreetly, and should be first initiated at only some favourable points of operation, where the people should at first be consulted only in rather a general manner, as to their approval, or disapproval of their corporators. Let me also premise, that the work might have been initiated under much more propitious circumstances, if the Government and the Education Committee had done something to macadamise the road, by a substantial layer of primary education for the many, instead of only giving liturgical, and other comparatively impractical education to the few.

While you have succinctly pointed out several difficulties and probable evils, which may attend the system, I do not think that you have duly referred to those which attend the present system, or to its chief evil; which is, that it contains no principle of self correction and progress; and that though it is sufficiently favourable to symmetry and a sort of Chinese tranquillity, it has not the capacity of throwing out its evils to the surface. When the surgeon looked at poor Meg Merrilies, and observed that the gun shot wound did not bleed outwardly, he shook his head.

You doubt the moral courage and energy of Hindoo corporators; but these have never been fairly tried. The means of trying and exciting their moral energy, consist in putting them on their energy; and let us further excite that energy, and also correct it, by making good municipal conduct a mere claim to preferment under Government. All errors, under such a system, will be phenomena of progress; whereas, under the present system, they are obstructions of progress; for in the present system there is no principle of self correction or of movement, unless it be backwards.

It is apprehended that the elusion of responsible, for irresponsible, municipalities, would overset the European functionaries with labour; but I believe that the apprehended downward responsibility would have the very opposite effect. I believe that many local details might be delegated to responsible, which cannot now be delegated to irresponsible, corporators; and that many general and insurmountable complaints, which now occupy much time, might, under a system of downward responsibility, be left to the redress of a new election. When a head palanquin boy, a head boatman, or the head of a gang of robbers, is doing wrong, a new headman is chosen—and this is common sense reduced to action. It is, perhaps, owing to due organization, that gang robbers are so much for the unorganized communities.

As to a further shool of European functionaries, I really think that there is already quite enough exclusion of the Natives. The European part of the service is, I think, considerably overrated; because their excellence is taken from their own reporters, and from a Press (proven chameleon!) too desirous of keeping on good terms with the favoured caste: the sold services being of a favoured caste, also seems to me a paramount obstacle to its excellence and efficiency, since that circumstance precludes impartial control and riddance of its worst members, who thus often sleekly enjoy an affluence of 25 years of misadministration, "because they must be provided for;" and another objection is, the other constitutional necessity which European service involves of most liberal and expensive absence allowances, and of employing the young and the ignorant of languages and habits, on duties requiring intimate knowledge of these.

Under the present system, the Police is allowed to be "as bad as it is possible to be." Individual exertion has, in revenue, usurped the place of collective adjustment, which latter system (as has been proved in some Turkish provinces), would reduce the expense and the inequality of taxation nearly one-half. There is at present not only no energy, but no principle from which united energy may be expected, by which the communities may raise themselves from the mire of ignorance, torpid subjection, and mere criminal obedience in which they grovel. As to their protracted want of energy, we have no ground on which to deny their untired energy, if once a principle of united operation be introduced. When Curran, at some Irish lun, said, that the numerous flaccid could, if united, have pulled him out of bed, he illustrated what even the Hindoos could do, if, instead of each acting individually and separately, they were united under elective constitutions, which would enable those who now can only pester, worse than the flaccid bites, by false complaints, and falsify (so as to frustrate) their own true complaints, to give vent to the sufferings from which these arise in the constitutional remedies which each locality would possess.

* If any allowance be given by Government for the repair of a village tank, &c., the present corporators invariably, if trusted with it, appropriate it to themselves; nay will they duly apportion a revenue remission.

* I do not impugn this; I only lament the necessity—as I do the immense cost of a European at College, or on sick certificate, or on furlough—as also the evils of his ten years apprenticeship inflicted on living (though dumb and helpless, because unorganized) subjects.

The country has now as local pores—such a local voting would be for the transpiration and the escape of those heats and diseases which thence must, from want of such escape, be tending, however secretly, to find their vent under the central Government: but if this last danger seems too remote for consideration,—as such dangers always are till their arrival,—I would again refer to the evils above mentioned, which are eating out the core of our seemingly stationary, but in reality, deteriorating provinces. And is it not most inconsistent, that while all consider the people unfit for even the initiation of primary education in local and social Government, they are considered fit for the higher politics, which are flung forth in the “dense and explosive atmosphere” of the capital? Truly, we are beginning at the wrong end of the work; and if we persist, the Hindoo will (as Mr. Silek would say,) “run ahead of himself.” If we do not initiate a development in the provinces, we may have an eruption at the capital.

One word more. The well organised municipalities, and such valuable offices as we give to the Natives, to divert them from their present objects of barren ambition in jewels and religious ceremonials, &c., will not as so many cords to bind the state ballion to the soil, so as to steady its first ascent.

Yours,

CASSANDRA.

P. S. You most correctly observe, that even the more energetic English could not sustain their corporations against the power of the aristocracy: but here (I would urge) the aristocracy have no such power—unless it be the European aristocracy, which, indeed, is not altogether indisposed to keep down the Natives, particularly in a case wherein a situation may, if conferred on a Native, “be lost to the service,” which reason I have heard a provincial Judge privately give for publicly opposing the appointment of a Native Judge.

A Hymn composed on reading the melancholy intelligence recently received from that Island.

BY THE REV. W. H. COOPER.

Ye hills of Madagascar
Have heard the secret sigh
Of many a pious sinner;
Of blessings from on high;
Amidst your forest masses,
Where spies might not intrude,
The chorus of their praise
Has cheer'd your solitude.
The moon-lit congregation
Has breathed the fervent pray'r,
And heard of Christ's salvation,
And sung his glories there;
There God's own book perusing,
Some holy pilgrims trod,
And, wrapp'd in heav'nly musings,
Held fellowship with God.
Farewell! this best occasion,
The wolf the fold has spy'd
And now in wild confusion
The flock is scattered wide,
In cruel bondage groaning
Beneath the oppressor's rod,
Yet heaven will hear their moaning;
Their record is with God.
The blood of thy first martyr
Is purple on thy plain;
But thou wast her departure,
And death to her was gain;
Her spirit rests in glory,
Beyond the reach of foes;
And earth shall hear the story
Of her triumphant close.
The Christian world shall waken
From lethargy profound;
The powers of darkness shaken
Shall totter to the ground.
And thine ever'd condition,
Dark Isle of Africa's sea,

Shall rouse one loud petition,
Till God shall set thee free.

Oh! be thy sons forgiven
Their blind and erpel deeds,
Altho' this blood with heaven
For righteous vengeance pleads,
May Christ's own blood bedew thee,
And wash thy stains away,
And Christ's own spirit thro' thee,
Diffuse the light of day.

—Christ. Watchman.

PRAY NOT FOR THE DEAD.

Pray not for the dead! Alas, alas! the prayer
So often poured in bitterness of heart,
In the first fulness of the son's despair
Over the graves of loved ones, who depart
And leave us mourning, shall we not confess
And know and feel its utter worthlessness?
Pray for the young! That they may live and learn
And hallow their Creator's name, and love
The creature he hath made; and so return
The spirit to its resting-place above,
To God who gave it; and the dust to dust,
Whence it was taken—pray for them and trust.
Pray for the weary and the sick at heart,
For those bowed down by sorrow's heavy weight;
Pray that the God of patience may impart
His own good spirit to the desolate;
And pray that they who sow in tears may reap
In joy unchanging—pray for them and weep.
Pray for the sinner—for the weak and blind;
For them who will not or who cannot pray;
Pray that the poor benighted ones may find
A star to light the darkness of the way;
The trouble spirit, the repentant sinner
May yet be there—then pray for them and fear.
Pray for the dying that their end be peace;
Pray for the mourners who bewail their loved;
Pray that the worn and aching heart may cease
To suffer, tho' they may not cease to feel!—
And oh! that sorrow may not pass away
And leave those hearts unchastened, deeply pray!
But pray not for the dead; nor weep nor sigh!—
Ye cannot know, ye cannot change their doom;
For as the tree hath fallen, it must lie:
In business of spirit, by the tomb
Kneel down, and tears of contrite sorrow shed;
Pray for the living—pray not for the dead.

PREBYTERIANISM IN ENGLAND.—It has been often felt as a great hardship by our Presbyterian brethren in England, that their complete separation from the Church to which they belonged tended to weaken their hands, and even by the want of a common bond of union, to dissipate them from one another. Two years ago, accordingly, it was resolved to form a Synod in England, in connection with the Church of Scotland, and acknowledging the same doctrines, discipline, worship, and government. The last meeting of this body took place on the 27th February at Manchester. The Presbyteries of London and Newcastle-upon-Tyne applied for union with the Synod, and were admitted. The Rev. Mr. Thomson, of North Shields, was chosen Moderator. It was proposed and carried, that a pastoral letter should be issued by the Synod, and read to all the churches under its charge. The right of Presbyterian soldiers to attend Presbyterian places of worship in England came under consideration, and a committee was appointed to communicate with other Synods on the subject, especially with the Synod of Ulster, to obtain information, and to make such application to Government as might be thought necessary. A committee was also appointed to watch the progress of the marriage bill. A petition to the Legislature was unanimously adopted, praying for national education based upon the principles of Christianity, and deprecating the establishment of any system having for its aim the mutilation of the Scriptures, or which did not provide that the entire Bible should be fully taught in the schools. It was agreed that the Moderator should prepare an historical tract, stating the origin of the Synod, and the motives which have led to its establishment, and that the tract should be printed for circulation under the superintendence of the London Presbytery. A deputation was appointed to attend next General Assembly, and to present a memorial, praying for representation in the Assembly, and that all other proper means be used to secure this object.

The whole proceedings of the Synod were conducted with the utmost harmony and unanimity, and the next meeting was appointed to take place at Newcastle-upon-Tyne on the third Wednesday in April, 1849.—Scottish Christian Herald.

THE DEPUTATION TO PALESTINE.—The General Assembly's Committee for the Conversion of the Jews have been most anxious to acquire accurate information in reference to the state of the Jewish people, more especially in the Holy Land. With this view, they unanimously agreed, at a late meeting, to send forth a deputation immediately to Palestine. The deputation consisted of the Rev. Dr. Blank, Professor of Theology in Marischal College, Aberdeen, the Rev. Mr. M'Cheyne, of Dundee, and the Rev. Mr. Buner, of Collace, ministers; and Robert Wodrow, Esq., Glasgow, elder. It is intended that the first object of this deputation should be to inquire whether there is a favourable opening in Palestine for the establishment of a mission to the Jews residing in that country, and to report to the General Assembly in May. After having accomplished this part of their mission, the deputation will then visit the Jews in Germany, Poland, and the other parts of the Continent where they chiefly abound. The expenses of this preliminary inquiry will be defrayed by a separate fund raised for the specific purpose. The step which the committee have thus taken is a wise one, and, with the blessing of God, will be of the greatest advantage to the cause of Jewish conversion.—Scottish Christian Herald.

CHRISTIAN RESPONSIBILITY.—The work before us is the work of God. We are highly favoured to be permitted to be fellow-labourers together in a cause so magnificent, so benevolent. Our present operations must be sustained and enlarged. Look at our English brethren.—Without aid from any other society, or from Government, for instance, they raise for Foreign Missions the sum of £30,000 pounds sterling, nearly double 100,000. They first pay tithe of all they possess for the support of an established church, and then support their own institutions. Brethren, do we pay tithes of what we possess even for all our benevolent objects? They do, shall I say five times? they do ten times as much in proportion to their numbers as we do, with all our advantages and wealth, and with no established church to support. What ought to be expected from us? We must raise at least double 100,000 in the next twelve months. We must do it, or be disgraced in the eyes of the Christian community. We must do it, or break the hearts of our missionary brethren. We must do it, for the glory of God and the salvation of souls. There are before us some examples of a benevolent sacrifice of property. What did Judaea a few years ago? Having, through his own relatives and those of his departed wife, and by the presents received from the English and Burman governments acquired from six to ten thousand dollars, he poured it all as a donation into your treasury. Why should Alexander Judson do this, more than you or I? Why should he love God more than we should? And why should he do more for his Master? Has he been redeemed by the blood of Jesus? so have we. Has he consecrated his all to God? so have we.—Speech of the Rev. S. H. Cone, before the American Baptist Mission Board.

Shyen Principalities; their extent, population, and language.—The Shyans call themselves Thel (Tai), and the Burmese and Talung, Mwoon; the Karens they call Kakhya; the Chinese they call Ya-roka. The Shyan population is great, but I have no means of ascertaining the amount with any degree of exactness. I have taken great pains to arrive at something more than conjecture—the result I will here give. There are three principalities that pay a nominal allegiance to the king of Siam, and five to the emperor of China; two are independent, and nine are tributary to the king of Ava. Besides these, there are five Shyan provinces, governed by officers appointed by the court of Ava; they are Mo-ah-nu, Bama, Mogang, and two others on the Khyen-daw river, between Mogang on the north-east, and the little Kingdom of Kathay on the west. Here are nineteen principalities and five provinces, extending from the great Cambodia river of the east, to within 150 miles of Ava on the west, and thence along the borders of China north as far as Mogang, and extending to within 100 miles of Ava north; then, taking a sweep round to the west of Ava, their population extends along the Khyen-daw river to the borders of Kathay, and, formerly, to the foot of the Aracan mountain. I have endeavoured to ascertain the population of each principality, and each province; and, after comparing the statements of Shyan princes, Shyan merchants, Burman officers and Burman merchants, together with the judicious information of Col. Burney, who has resided eight years in Ava, I have come to the conclusion that there are about eight millions of Shyans. All these people speak the same language, and have the same written character, with the exception of two principalities, the Paloung and the Yien; and these are not radically different. The Paloungs and Yiens read Shyen, and I believe the greater part of them speak it. Thus we have eight millions who read and speak one language. Their language is monosyllabic, and partakes largely of nasal sounds. Their alphabet is an improvement on the Burman, as it is nearly the useful consonants. They have no vowels, which are merely ever used; certain points or marks are attached to the monosyllable, to make the vowels sound. Their alphabet, in form, hardly varies from the Burman.

Kakhya; their localities, number and names.—Preparation for the Gospel.—I have noticed, in my journal, only a few of the interviews I have had with this people, and only a small part of the information I gained relative to their numbers, their names, and their political relations. The result of all my inquiries is, that Kakhya is only another name for the Karens. All these mountain tribes, through the whole extent of the Shyan country, and still north into Thibet, are called Kakhya, except in the Hukong valley, between Mogang and Assam, where they are called Thing-han Kakhya. The whole mountain country between Mogang and Kathay is inhabited by the same people. Around the Merabon gulf, from Maroon in Bama, and extending inland as far as the Burman population has ever extended, the mountain tribes are called Karens. Between Rangon and Toung Oo, and between Toung Oo and Ava, they are very numerous, as also between Toung Oo and Monay, a Shyan city about 350 miles east of Ava. There are some tribes scattered along between Bama and the Shyan states, called Kara-nee, and these extend as far west as Zimay (Zemay). These are less numerous than those who live in the vicinity of Burman towns. Some have erroneously considered them as belonging to the Shyan family. Their language and every thing else pertaining to them is Karen. Kara-nee signifies red Karen, and they are so called because their clothes are mostly of a brownish red color.

In addition to this, the south-east part of Thibet is inhabited by Kakhya; or, at least, I have reason to believe so, as the Shyans who live in the most northern part of Burmah, and adjoining Thibet, call the country "the Kakhya country." It will be seen, then, that three mountain tribes are scattered over a vast extent of country, and their population I make to be about five millions. It will require too much space to mention the particulars by which I arrive at this conclusion. At another time, if necessary, this can be done.

The Kakhya, Thing-han Kakhya, Karens, and Kara-nee, are only so many different names of the same people. Scattered as they are amidst idolaters, they have remained a distinct people. From age to age, they have retained idolatry, and all its imposing forms. In oral songs they have kept alive the remembrance of eminent prosperity, and inspired hopes of some unalike happiness hereafter. It is an interesting fact, that they have some idea of a Supreme Being, and have a tradition that the book of God will be given to them. Perhaps this is the reason they have been kept from the deadening influence of idolatry. They appear to be prepared for the reception of that gospel which brings life and immortality to light. All that I know of their traditions, and all that I have seen of their habits, go to convince me that their conversion will be rapid, according as they can be brought into contact with the word of God. The press which the Board has placed in Tavoy, is exclusively devoted to the good of this race; two or three more will probably be needed before long. That will be a blessed day, when the north, and east, and west of Ava, and the whole frontier of Burmah bordering upon China, where this interesting people chiefly abound, shall be visited with the same instrumentality which is now in operation in the Provinces. If we are faithful to our trust, these five millions will get their books through the medium of the Christian press, and consequently will never be idolaters. Now, they are enveloped in darkness, like a benighted traveller in some lonely desert. Their readiness to hear of the "Eternal God," and listen to his word, admonishes us to hasten to their assistance; that their mountains and their hills may rejoice; that they may sing, "How beautiful are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace."

P. S. Having been assured by the Shyans on the Irrawaddy, seventy miles above Raman, that Thibet adjoining Burmah was the Kakhya country, and having fully satisfied myself that Kakhya was only another name for the Karens, I had just occurred to me, that perhaps in Malin Brama's account of Thibet, I might find something about the mountain tribes there. To my surprise, I find a quotation from Marco Polo on this very subject. He travelled through these countries in the 13th century. He says, "Thus the country of Cordi is the south-east point of Thibet, and perhaps the country of the nation of the Karims (Karens), which is spread over Ava." I have quoted this, because it corroborates the testimony of the Shyans.

I wish also to remark, that the tribes between Mogang and Upper Assam are called by the English, Singphos, though in my journal I have followed the Burman and Shyan, who call them Thing-han, and sometimes Thing-han Kakhya, because they are really Kakhya.—Bapt. Mis. Mag.

LIBERIA.—Liberia extends from the St. Paul's river on the north-west, to the Cavalry river on the south-east, a distance of three hundred miles along the coast. Its extent inland is from ten to forty miles. Four separate colonies are now included within its limits, viz.

Monrovia, established by the American Colonization Society, including the towns of Monrovia, New Georgia, Caldwell, Millborough and Marshall.

Bassa Cove, established by the United Colonization Societies of New York and Pennsylvania. This colony includes Bassa Cove and Edina. The latter village was founded by the American Colonization Society, and lately ceded to the United Societies.

Greenville, established by the Mississippi and Louisiana Colonization Societies at Sinou.

Maryland, established by the Maryland Colonization Society at Cape Palmas.

In the nine villages enumerated above, there is a population of about 5000—all, of course, coloured persons, of which three thousand five hundred are emigrants from this country, and the remainder natives of Africa, mostly youth, who have come into the colonies to learn "African" and make themselves "white men" by conforming to the habits of civilization, and becoming subject to our laws.

The commerce of the colonies, though in its infancy, is already extensive. From dollars 80,000 to dollars 150,000 is exported annually, in sawwood, ivory, palm oil, and hides; and an equal or greater amount of the manufactures and productions of Europe and America are brought into the colonies in return. Monrovia, which is the largest town and principal seaport, carries on a considerable coasting trade, by means of small vessels built and owned by her own citizens. Not less than twelve or fifteen of these, averaging from ten to thirty tons burden, manned and navigated by her own citizens, are constantly engaged in a profitable trade along seven hundred miles of the coast.

The harbour of Monrovia is seldom clear of foreign vessels; more than seventy of which, from the United States, England, France, Sweden, Portugal and Denmark, touch there annually.

Bassa Cove and Cape Palmas have built good harbours, and possess great advantages for commerce. Already their waters are frequented by the constant presence of traders from other countries, and in a few years, when the hand of enterprise shall have developed the rich mines of wealth, which nature has so abundantly provided there, these growing towns will become the centres of an extensive and important business.

Sinou, too, possesses an excellent harbour, and is the natural outlet of a vast tract of rich and productive country. Under the fostering hand of its enterprising founders it will soon become an important link in the mercantile chain of America-Africa establishments. The productions of the country, which may be raised in any quantity for exportation, are coffee, cotton, sugar, rice, indigo, palm oil, together with the gums, dye-woods, ivory, &c., which are collected from the forests.

The state of morals in the colonies is emphatically of a high order. Sabbath-breaking, drunkenness, profanity and quarrelling are very almost unknown in Liberia. A temperance society, formed in 1844, numbered in a few weeks after its organization 500 members; at that time more than one-fifth of the whole population.

At Bassa Cove and Cape Palmas the sale and use of ardent spirits are forbidden by law. In the other colonies the use of public houses so effectually prohibits drunk drinking that no respectable person would dare indulge an appetite so disreputable.

There are eighteen churches in Liberia, viz. at Monrovia four, New Georgia two, Caldwell two, Millborough two, Edina two, Bassa Cove three, Marshall one, Cape Palmas two. Of these, eight are Baptist, six Methodist, three Presbyterian, and one Episcopalian.

As there are forty clergymen in the colonies, all the churches are not only regularly supplied with preaching, but religious meetings are weekly held in many of the native villages.

Eight hundred of the colonists, or more than one-fifth of the whole population, are professed Christians, in good standing with the several churches with which they are connected. As might be expected, where so large a proportion of the people are pious, the general tone of society is religious. Nowhere is the Sabbath more strictly observed, or the places of worship better attended. Sunday schools are established generally in the churches, into which, in many cases, the native children are gathered with those of the colonists.

There are twelve weekly day schools in all the settlements, supported generally by education and missionary societies in this country. The teachers in most cases are coloured persons. A laudable thirst for knowledge pervades the community, and a great desire is expressed for an academic institution, toward the support of which they would contribute liberally; though as yet they are scarcely able to establish one single-handed.

In some places, as at Bassa Cove, literary societies are formed for mutual improvement, much on the plan of village lyceums in this country.

At Bassa Cove and Monrovia there are public libraries for the use of the people. The one at the former place numbers 1200 or 1500 volumes.

A monthly newspaper is published at Monrovia. The articles in this paper afford good testimony of the general intelligence of the people, and reflect great credit upon the talented editor, a colored man.

There are at present 25 or 30 white persons connected with the various missionary and education societies, or attached to the colonies as physicians, &c. The government of Liberia is essentially republican, all the officers, except the governor, (who is appointed by the Colonization Society,) being chosen by the people. Elections are held annually in every village, and are conducted with great propriety and decorum. A vice governor, legislative councillors, a high sheriff, constables, &c., are some of the officers elected annually. The militia is well organized and efficient. — Baptist Missionary Magazine.

SCIENTIFIC.

ARSENIC.—M. Orfila has discovered a method of detecting the smallest atoms of arsenic, even when administered to solution. For this he used a lamp, the hydrogen gas of which was produced by a piece of zinc, steeped in diluted sulphuric acid. The arsenic, however small the quantity, when exposed to the flame of this gas, is carried along by it, and if a cold substance be presented to the end of the narrow tube conveying the flame, the arsenic will be deposited on it like a spot. — Athenaeum.

ELECTRIC SPARK.—M. Edmond Bequerel has been making experiments on the calorific radiation of the electric spark, and comes to the following conclusions: whether this spark prove to be from a battery or not, there is no elevation of temperature, let the distance be what it will; but as the electric spark excites or revives the phosphorescence of a body gifted with this property, it is reasonable to suppose, that it affects it by some peculiar radiation, differing from that which produces the reaction of heat. — Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DRUIDICAL REMAINS.—In the mountains of Ardes, some very curious remains of Druidical worship have been found. The spot is very wild, and is supposed to have been the site of a forest now destroyed. On digging below the grass, a layer of charcoal, mixed with a powdered vitrified substance, presented itself, in the midst of which was buried an urn, containing a second, also vitrified, and of a square form, in which were placed two fragments of bones which were not consumed by fire. Round this vase, and at equal distances, three lamps. Within the excavation are fragments of vases of different forms, resembling the most beautiful Roman pottery. — Athenaeum.

PARIS.—According to the last census in 1836, the population of Paris, exclusive of strangers and troops, was 699,124; and of the whole department of the Seine, 1,106,694. The total number of births in the capital for the same year, was 28,942; deaths, 24,037; marriages, 8,308; still-born children, 1,727. Of the births, 14,645 were males, and 14,297 females; 4,774 took place in hospitals, &c.; 9,633 were illegitimate—viz. 4,801 males, and 4,732 females; of which 2,667 were recognized by parents. Of the deaths, 12,014 were males, and 12,943 were females, 14,945 persons died in their own homes, 8,335 in the civil hospital, 734 in the military hospital; 64 in prisons, and 299 were deposited in the Morgue—viz. 248 males, and 49 females.—Christ. Watchman.

IMPORTANT EXCAVATION.—We have been politely favoured by Professor Eton, of Brown University, with the following interesting extract from a letter written by Geo. W. Greene, Esq. U. S. Consul at Rome. We hope to be indebted to the same kindness for a full description of this interesting discovery, as soon as it shall be received in this country.

"You would find many changes in Rome. The excavations in the Forum, and around the Temple of Vesta at Rome, have led to some highly interesting discoveries. At Porta Maggiore a tomb has been discovered so singular in its architecture and ornaments as to have excited an uncommon degree of interest, and had not the inscription been nearly perfect, it might be hard to say how many volumes of controversy and dissertation it would have given rise to. I will send you the best account that has been given of it. Nibby has in the press a new work upon Rome superior to any thing hitherto published.—Proc. Jour.

ANTI-DUELING BILL.—The bill, as it passed the senate, is in the following words:

A BILL to prohibit the giving or accepting, within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that if any person shall, to the District of Columbia, challenge another to fight a duel, or shall send or deliver any written or verbal message purporting or intending to be such challenge, or shall accept any such challenge or message, or shall, knowingly, carry or deliver any such challenge or message, to fight a duel, in or out of the said District, and such duel shall be fought in or out of the said District, and either of the parties therein shall be slain, or mortally wounded in such duel, the surviving party to such duel, and every person carrying or delivering such challenge or message, or acceptance of such challenge or message as aforesaid, and all others aiding or abetting therein, shall be guilty of felony, and upon conviction thereof, in any court competent to the trial thereof in the said District, shall be punished by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall assault, strike, beat, or wound, or cause to be assaulted, stricken, beaten, or wounded, any person in the District of Columbia, by declining or refusing to accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall post or publish, any writing charging any such person, so declining or refusing to accept any such challenge, to be a coward or using any other opprobrious or injurious language therein, tending to degrade and disgrace such person for so offending, on conviction thereof in any court competent to trial thereof, in said District, shall be punished by confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the oath now to be prescribed by law to be administered to the grand jury in the District of Columbia, they shall be sworn faithfully and impartially to inquire into, and true presentment make, of all offences against this act.—American Paper.

FREE NEGROES IN ALABAMA.—“The Legislature of Alabama has passed an act prohibiting that every free person of color residing in that State, on board a vessel as cook, steward, mariner, or in any other employment, shall be immediately lodged in prison, and detained until the departure of the vessel, when the Captain thereof shall be bound under a heavy penalty to take him away. If any free person of colour thus sent away shall return, he or she shall receive thirty-nine lashes, and if found within the State twenty days after such punishment, he or she be sold for a slave for a term not exceeding one year. The Captain of any vessel in which such free person of colour shall arrive, shall give security in the sum of dollars 2,000 that he will take away the said free person of colour. The 6th section makes it lawful for any person to seize and make slave for life, to his own use, any free person of colour who may have come into the State of Alabama, after the 1st day of February, 1853, provided this section shall not take effect until the 1st day of August next. The 7th section makes it lawful for any person to seize upon and make a slave for life, of any free person of colour who may be found in the State of Alabama, after the passage of this act, and who shall have come into the State since its passage.”—Christ. Watchman.

ANNIVERSARY OF WASHINGTON'S INAUGURATION.—The first inauguration of Washington, as President of the United States, took place at the old Federal Hall in the city of New York, on the 30th of April, 50 years ago. The occasion was celebrated by Chancellor Livingston, on the 15th in front of the Hall, and after this ceremony, the members of Congress returned to the Hall, where Washington delivered the inaugural address. The assembly then proceeded to St. Paul's Church, where prayers were read by the Bishop. The Federal Hall stood on the spot where the new Custom House is now building. The 50th Anniversary, which occurs to-day, is to be celebrated by the Historical Society of the city of New York, by an Oration, and public dinner. The Oration is to be delivered by the late President Adams.—N. Y. Paper of April 30.

COLONIAL HISTORY.—A bill passed in the New York Senate on Friday, to appoint an agent to procure and transcribe documents in Europe, relating to the Colonial History of the State. The bill appropriated a sum not exceeding dollar 400 to carry it into effect. John L. Stephens, Esq., the author of travels in Egypt, Arabia, &c. is named in the bill as the agent.—Christ. Watchman.

MINISTER FROM TEXAS.—The Globe announces that on Thursday, the Hon. Richard G. Dunlap was introduced by the Secretary of State to the President, and delivered his credentials as Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary of the Republic of Texas.—Ibid.

A VENERABLE CONSUL.—Miss Hall, in her “Rambles in Europe,” (a very interesting work by the way) in 1856, while at Lyons, was waited upon by the American Consul at that port. He holds his office by the appointment and under the hand of Washington. If still living, he is doubtless the only man in existence who can exhibit the signature of the immortal father of his country as the seal of his office. In 1856, according to Miss Hall, his form was erect, and his face was slightly wrinkled. “He would,” she says, “pass readily for fifty-five or sixty, and yet he must be verging upon ninety. It is more than half a century since he has looked upon his native land.”—Herald.

THE ATTEL PLENO.—The St. Catharines, U. C. Journal of the 6th, states that five men were swept over the Niagara Falls on the previous Thursday. The Journal says:—

“The only particulars which we have been able to learn, are, that just before sunrise on Thursday morning last, a boat with two men in it, was discovered in the middle of the river, above the falls, vainly endeavouring to make their way through the ice, with which they were encircled, to the Canada shore. Their utmost exertion proved unavailing, and in a short time they were seen to enter the cascades, when they disappeared. In half an hour after, another boat, with three men in it was discovered in the same awful situation, and trying too, to gain the Canada side; but in a few moments shared the melancholy fate of the other. Yesterday the body of a man was picked up in the Whirlpool, supposed to be one of those unfortunate men, having about his person two hundred dollars, and a valuable gold watch.”—Christ. Watch.

NORRIS LOCOMOTIVE MANUFACTORY AT PHILADELPHIA.—We learn from the Philadelphia North American that seventy-eight Locomotives and Tenders, &c. have been completed since the establishment of these works, of which 1 has been sent to Canada, 1 to Cuba, 1 to England, 2 to Germany, 2 to Austria, and 71 to different parts of the United States. There are over 400 hands employed, and sixty Locomotives and Tenders, &c. are finished per annum, together with a large amount of other machinery. The foreign orders now on hand, which will all be shipped before the 1st of August next, are as follows:—For Prussia 2, Austria 2, Hungary 2, England 9.—Ibid.

WORCESTER RAIL ROAD.—The report made to the Legislature represents the income of this road for the last year, at dollars 212,345.08, viz.—for passengers, dollars 112,032.43; freight, &c., dollars 94,927.81; rents and storage, dollars 5,432.29. The expenses were dollars 63,573.97; surplus, dollars 150,759.00. The amount divided of this surplus during the year was dollars 102,000, or 6 per cent. on the capital stock of dollars 1,700,000. Before declaring the last dividend, the directors reserved for deterioration of perishable materials in the road, and depreciation of engines and cars beyond the repairs, the sum of dollars 15,000.—Traveler.

WORCESTER RAIL ROAD.—It appears from the annual report that the whole receipts of this road last year, were dollars 263,115.13, viz.—for transportation of passengers, dollars 195,974.73; merchandise, 64,148.92; mail, 2,320.00; rents, 1,741.20. The expenses were dollars 120,044.23; leaving a surplus of dollars 145,070.87. Out of this, a dividend of 6 per cent. or dollars 136,312, was paid to the owners of the capital stock.—Ibid.

THE ORTHOGRAPHY AND THE PHRASEOLOGY OF THE LATE ACT.—The Schoolmaster, who has long been on his travels, has, at length, reached India, and taken up his abode with our metropolitan Editors. He has begun the exercise of his vocation by endeavouring to correct the irregularities of a certain Monthly Journalist, who has been employed for some time past, in waging war with the Queen's English; but as the Editor appears to be beyond the power of redemption, the Schoolmaster has turned his hand to the Acts of the Legislative Council; but, unfortunately, in his first essay has betrayed such hypercriticism in his censures, and inflicted chastisement so arbitrarily, that we fear it will be necessary to send him back to England to learn his art more perfectly before he again undertakes to teach.

The Schoolmaster takes the Legislative Council to task for having spelt the plural of attorney, 'attornies,' and attributes it to sheer ignorance of the rules of spelling; which, doubtless, teach all little boys, that y is not changed, when there is another vowel in the syllable, as key, keys; delay, delays; attorney, attorneys; but he appears to be ignorant what a host of authorities may be brought in support of the faulty practice. To begin with the most common, but not the least valuable. If we take up either of the Calcutta Directories, or the East India Register, published in London, we find the word 'attornies.' The notices of Probate in the Supreme Court, published in the Calcutta Exchange Gazette, have the same spelling in the two instances immediately before us. The same orthography occurs in the Charter of the Supreme Court, as printed in Calcutta, in 1819, and reprinted in 1826. It occurs also at page 101 of a well known practical commentary on the statutes relating to India, published in Calcutta, in 1830. But there is still higher authority for this orthography. Turn to the 55th George III. chap. lxxv., and it will be found that whenever the word occurs in the plural, it is spelt 'attornies.' Turn also to the late Indian Charter Statute, Sect. 113; turn to the Indian Insolvent Statute, Sect. 2; turn to the 6th and 7th William IV. chap. cxiv. sect. 1, of which the clause in the Act where the word occurs, is a literal transcript; and in every instance the plural of attorney is written 'attornies.' These authorities may suffice, without adducing others, in support of our assertion, that the balance of usage is in favour of the mode adopted by the Council; and that the charge of ignorance, founded upon the different practice of the spelling book may have prevailed, is little else than pedantry. If the authorities on either side, however, had been equal, we think the Legislative Council has done wisely in adhering to the Parliamentary model; partly because in all questions of legal orthography, the authority of the law makers should be considered decisive; and partly because this deference will show, from analogy, that the idea said to be entertained by our local Legislature of endeavouring to subvert the authority of Parliament, is totally groundless. When the Council is so anxious to uphold Parliamentary authority, it is so comparatively trivial a matter as that of spelling, it is unreasonable to suspect them of endeavouring to undermine it in graver questions.

The Schoolmaster next attacks the phraseology of the Act, and asks, with great simplicity, what benefit can arise to a prisoner in "a case of Summary Conviction," from being assisted by Counsel? This question is still more manifestly founded on ignorance. For it supposes that "all cases of summery conviction," means the same thing as "all cases in which a prisoner is summarily convicted." The fact, however, is, that the Magistrate's proceeding from the moment of his initiatory summons, and in all matters previous to the question of punishment or acquittal, has no other appellation in law, but that of "a Case of Summary Conviction;" a term by which that form of trial is distinguished from a proceeding by indictment. Thus in Paley's Treatise on "Summary Conviction," will be found the law respecting the allowance of costs to defendants acquitted before Magistrates, acting "in cases of Summary Conviction." But it is enough to say, in justification of the recent Act, that the matter which has been cavilled at, is copied verbatim from the Statute 6th. and 7th. Will. IV. chap. cxiv. sect. 2. So that the allowance of Counsel in "all cases of Summary Conviction," has, from the year 1836, to the date of the last Overland Mail, been extensively practised and perfectly understood by the lawyers and magistrates; and, for any thing that we know to the contrary, has not been cavilled at even by the Schoolmasters, of England.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A MONT DE PIÉTÉ IN CALCUTTA. We learn that a plan has been formed for the establishment of a Mont de Piété in Calcutta, on the principle, somewhat modified, on which these benevolent Institutions have been established throughout Europe. Having been favoured with a sight of the Prospectus, we have much pleasure in offering it our humble tribute of support.

The object of these Institutions in Europe is to lower the rate of interest to the poor, and to turn the profits to the Hospitals. They are public Institutions, managed under the direction of public officers; and no private profit-making is allowed to interfere with their operations. "It is at the Mont de Piété only that money can be lent on pledge; to them the poor man resorts with perfect confidence, that he will receive a fair value on the article deposited; that no advantage will be taken of his ignorance or necessity; and that he is contributing to a fund which will comfort and relieve him in the day of distress and adversity." We quote from the same pamphlet, to which we are indebted for the foregoing observation, the following notice of the vast and beneficial results which have flowed from the constitution of Monts de Piété on the Continent.

"It may not be uninteresting to observe the effect of these Institutions. By them Frederick the Great reclaimed Silésia. Most of the great public buildings in Europe—Hospitals, Aqueducts, Bridges, &c., have been completed out of their surplus profits. In Tuscany and Bavaria their condition is most flourishing, and in the Low Countries they exist to the number of at least one hundred and sixteen. In a word, it is by the agency of such institutions that the Hospitals on the Continent are chiefly supported."

The regulations for the Mont de Piété at Bordeaux are particularly interesting, both from the fact that they were drawn up under the eye of Napoleon, and because of the vast amount of good which has flowed from them.

"The Capital of the Establishment is to be £24,000, to be raised by shares or loans; eight per cent. interest to be paid to lenders, and the property of the Hospitals to become security to them: this Capital to be divided into single shares of £100, which may be sub-divided into half shares. The Shareholder's certificate shall be transferable by endorsement, but all transfers must be registered at the Mont de Piété. Shareholders may at the end of three years withdraw the amount of their shares, on giving three months' notice. The profits are to be divided into two equal shares; one to be long to the Hospitals, the other to the Shareholders. The portion belonging to the Hospitals to be applied first to the completing the necessary number of shares, until the subscribed sum shall thus have been made to amount to the above sum of £24,000; it is next to be applied to the payment of such Shareholders as may wish to withdraw; then to the purchase of the shares of the other holders, who shall be bound to receive back their subscribed principal sums, according to the order of their shares, which shall be determined by lot; thus eventually the whole of the shares will belong to the Hospitals.

"Trustees of Charities may lend the funds of their Establishments, and receive eight per cent. as above; but they shall be bound to receive back their principal, when all private Shareholders shall have been paid off.

"The same regulations applied to the Guardians of the Estates of Minors, the Committee of Lunatics, and the Treasurers of Municipal and other Corporations.

"This Institution had the effect of banishing pauperism from Bordeaux and its neighbourhood.

"Within a few years the shares of the subscribers of the original fund, (all of whom received eight per cent. per annum,) were bought up by the fructification of the funds, which, pending the whole of this period, supported all the necessary charities at Bordeaux.

"From the same fund, with the assistance of some donations, the Hospital in that city, said to be the finest in Europe, has been lately completed and endowed."

England alone is without a Mont de Piété. There, pawn-broking is a private trade; the poor are ground down by usury; and the funds which would be sufficient to maintain all the Hospitals in England, go to enrich the extortionate pawn-brokers. We use the word intentionally. We are accustomed to consider the condition of the poor in India, who are obliged to borrow, as in the last degree wretched; but is the reader prepared to believe, that on the system now practised in the city of Limerick, One Hundred Pounds a year lent by the pawn-brokers in shilling loans, redeemed in the week at compound interest, yields the almost incredible sum of £45,690-7-0½d. per annum, which is paid by the poorest and most wretched classes?

Mr. Barrington, of a family endeared to Ireland by its benevolence, was the first who attempted to turn this stream of profit to objects of public utility. He endeavoured to rouse his fellow countrymen to the importance of the object, and at length succeeded in obtaining the assembly of a public meeting, at which it was determined to open a Mont de Piété, or Charitable Pawn-office, in Limerick, for the support of Barrington's Hospital in that city. The success which has attended that experiment, has induced several gentlemen in Calcutta to project a similar Institution, and we are now enabled to state that the following plan has been thought of for the constitution of the Society:

"That a capital of 1,00,000 Rupees be formed by 500 shares of 200 Rs. each, to be increased as experience and expediency may suggest.

"That the Institution be managed by a Board of Directors, elected annually; each of whom must hold 5 shares of the capital stock.

"That the dealings of the Institution be at first limited to what are technically called hard goods, imperishable articles in which no loss can well occur, such as gold, silver, precious stones, brass, copper, furniture, &c.

"That the rate of interest charged be one pie in the Rupee per month, or Rupees 18-12 per cent. per annum.

"That from the yearly profits 8 per cent. on the capital be first paid to the Shareholders.

"That of the remaining profits, one-half go to the Shareholders; and the other half to form a Charity Fund, to be distributed as the Directors may think fit. As soon as the Prospectus has been circulated, and obtained general approval, I propose to call a public meeting, by which a Board or Committee can be appointed to carry the project into effect. Those, therefore, who may be inclined to take a favourable view of the design, are requested to append an observation to this effect, that general opinion on the matter may be thus ascertained previous to further proceedings in the matter."

We think that such an Institution is much wanted in the city of Palaces, which, like other capitals, contains a vast mass of poverty in the midst of all its splendour. In such a country as this, the establishment of Monts de Piété cannot fail to be highly beneficial to the poor, even though the profits should not be devoted to the establishment of Hospitals. The lowering of the interest on deposits to a piece a month for the Rupee, must be a great relief to those who now borrow under two pie, or thirty-six per cent., and are often obliged, when they can least afford it, to pay double that amount for temporary, but indispensable, accommodation. We are not prepared to say that the plan drawn up is the best that could be devised, or that it is susceptible of no improvement; neither, indeed, have its projectors any such idea. While we admire the feelings in which it originated, we must reserve to ourselves the privilege of examining its claims to adoption at a future period, after the subject shall have been canvassed by our contemporaries.

OATHS.—We have the pleasure this week, of adding another member of the Civil Service, to the number of our Correspondents on the important subject of oaths. He, too, is astonished at the extraordinary love of oath-taking exhibited in the English law, and at the gratuitous introduction of the monstrosity into this country. He is at a loss whether to attribute the swearing propensity to exuberance of religious feeling, or to the reverse of it. We believe it springs from neither, but rather from that slovenly mode of legislating to which we owe the crude mass of our patch-work statutes. If for the continual tinkering of the laws, which is indulged in, every Parliamentary Session, we had solemn periodical revisions of the whole legal system, we should have some likelihood of regard being paid to first principles, the dictates of reason and experience, instead of an unthinking adoption of ancient errors and prejudices, and a blind following of the old track of legal procedure. Our Legislative Council have no excuse for following the evil example of Parliament; and they ought more carefully to avoid it.

As Judex has brought the subject again before us, we may as well take the opportunity of putting the actual state of the law respecting oaths, before our readers. The following is, we believe, a sufficiently accurate enumeration of those enactments in the Regulations of Government, in which the law of oath-dispensing is embodied: Section 6. Reg. IV. of 1793; Section 7. Reg. III. of 1803; Clause 1. Section 25. Reg. VIII. of 1803; and Clause 6. Section 25. Reg. VIII. of 1808.

The first of these runs thus: "The Zillah and City Courts are to administer to parties consenting to be examined on oath, and to witnesses, such oaths as may be considered most binding on their consciences, according to their respective persuasions. But if a witness shall be of a rank or caste which, according to the prejudice of the country, would render it improper to take an oath, the Judge of the Court may dispense with his being sworn, provided he shall subscribe an oath of the undermentioned declarations, according as he may be of the Mahomedan or Hindoo persuasion."

The Declaration thus prescribed for a Hindoo witness, exempted from taking an oath, is this: "I will faithfully answer, according to the truth, each question as may be put to me by the Court, in the cause now before the Court. I will not declare any thing not warranted by the truth; if I declare any thing not warranted by the truth, I shall be deserving of punishment from Ishvur." And the Declaration to be signed by a Mahomedan witness in like circumstances is: "I sincerely promise and swear in the presence of Almighty God, that I will faithfully, and without partiality, answer, according to the questions that may be put to me by the Court, respecting the cause now before the Court." And after the witness has given his deposition, he is to add the following declaration: "I swear in the presence of Almighty God, that I have faithfully, and without partiality, answered, according to the truth, the questions put to me by the Court, respecting the cause now before the Court."

Here, then, we have it enacted, that Judges shall administer such oaths as may be considered most binding on the consciences of parties, with reference to their religious persuasions: and in consideration of Native prejudice or honour, authority is given to dispense with an oath altogether, and forms of declarations are prescribed, evidently understood to be of a nature so binding upon the conscience, that even in the way of simple declaration and subscription, they are to be held as good as any oath whatever. It is impossible, therefore, that they should not be held in their own nature perfectly binding on the conscience of every party, when, instead of being administered as mere declarations, their form is so far changed, that the sanctity of an oath is added to them. The form of adjuration for Mahomedans is unquestionable to any religionist whatever, who believes in the existence and government of God, and does not consider swearing in every form to be unlawful. And, indeed, the form for the Hindoos appears to be equally good.

According to the technical rules of English law, as may be seen in the 3rd chapter of Phillips's Law of Evidence, it is required for giving validity to the oath of a deponent, that he believe there is a God, and a future state of rewards and punishments; and that, by taking an oath with this acknowledgment, he imprecates the divine displeasure and judgement on himself, if his evidence be false. In this rule there is very little common sense: but it is law. And hereby law is satisfied with a man's own declaration, that he believes in God and stands in awe of his judgement, when the law he does either, the more unscrupulous he will be in asserting he does both. Had we assurance of his religious conviction and principle, good reason would have been given for paying regard to his testimony. But general repute amongst his neighbours for veracity and integrity would be a thousand times more satisfactory, than his own assertion of his sound creed and religious fear. The legal principle of oath-taking, however, is as we have given it: and the declaration for Hindoo witnesses, turned into an oath, we believe, perfectly satisfies its requirements. There can be no question about their belief in a Supreme Being, or in future retribution. At the same time, the term Lahur, by which they swear, is one which no Christian can hesitate to use. Indeed, it is the name by which Christian scholars, with universal consent, have thought it proper to render the sacred name of God, in the translation of the Scriptures into the languages of India. With the Hindoos, indeed, its application is not very precise. It may be given to any object of divine worship, and is conventionally used with most frequency for one particular deity of the Hindoo pantheon: but it is no more naturally applicable to any of them, than the English term Lord would be, with which it may, perhaps, be considered synonymous.

Section 7. of Reg. III. of 1803 enacts for the Coded Provinces, as before, that a Judge may dispense with the swearing of a witness, "provided he shall subscribe one of the undermentioned declarations, according as he may be of the Mahomedan or Hindoo persuasion: or such other declaration as the Judge, from local circumstances, may deem necessary." The form of declaration for Hindoos, given in the present enactment, differs indeed materially from that before quoted, in ending with the clause—"And if I break this declaration, I acknowledge myself to be as guilty as if I had killed a bramhin, or slain a cow on the banks of the Gangra, at Causee," (Kaslee, Benares). Whatever may be thought of this clause, it must be remembered that the previous part of the enactment had given the Judge authority to put aside the whole declaration, and substitute any other for it which he might deem necessary. And if he could deal so with the whole, of course he could do the same with any part. But what value can be attached to the new clause, we are at a loss to conceive. It expresses a belief respecting the guilt of perjury; which it declares to be equal to the guilt of killing a bramhin or a cow. If a Hindoo has such a conviction, it must be because the Shastras say so. And if they say no such thing, the enactment compels a Hindoo to declare his belief in what is in fact no article of his faith. We believe it would be a vain task to search the Shastras for any such doctrine: and how, therefore, the recital of it is to bind a deponent's conscience we know not. We do know, that Hindoos deny that the clause can have any such power.

Regulation VIII. of 1803 respects the administration of criminal justice in the Coded Provinces; and in the 25th clause it is enacted, that the same rules prescribed for oaths and declarations in civil cases in Reg. III. of 1803, shall be followed in the Criminal Courts. To reconcile all parties to the practice of swearing, opinions are given respecting its legality by both the Mahomedan and the Hindoo Law Officers of the Sudder. The Caree-ool-Cunat and Mooties of the Xizamut Adawlut are said to have declared that there is no prohibition against an oath to the truth being taken by Musulmans in any case; (although it is not required by the Mahomedan law to give validity to evidence in judicial cases); and the Pundits of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut are said to have reported, "that the Hindoo law not only authorizes, but requires, the oaths of witnesses in civil and criminal cases; and prescribes the form in which oaths may be administered to persons of various tribes, regard being had to the importance of the matter in dispute," and so forth.

It is remarkable that the Mahomedan Law Officers say not a word about the oath on the Koran. And it is still more remarkable, that in no enactment or construction of the Regulations is that form of oath once mentioned or alluded to. It would, therefore, be absurd to talk of any Judge or Magistrate being under obligation to administer such an oath to Mahomedans. The opinion of the Hindoo Pundits is now generally admitted to be erroneous, in several of its most important clauses. Especially is it certain, that in some of the Shastras, he who swears by the water of the Ganges is said to consign his race for fourteen generations to future torments. It is cruel in the extreme, to compel people to do an act from which they apprehend such consequences: and, after all, nothing is gained by the compulsion. But the point especially worthy of observation respecting this Regulation is, that whilst the lawfulness of the usual oaths is maintained, witnesses are still allowed solemnly to establish the truth of their testimony in any of the previously prescribed forms, which may be practicable, and suitable to the occasion. Of those forms we have already said enough. In the 6th clause of this section it is expressly enacted, that "should a Hindoo party or witness state objections to the usual form of swearing by water of the Ganges, copper and tallow; and offer to take any other form of oath, which on enquiry may be found legal and binding on the conscience of such party or witness, and which it may be practicable and convenient to administer to him, he shall be sworn accordingly." Hence we conclude, that the Regulations care little for rigid adherence to the ordinary forms of securing, and are perfectly satisfied with any form which can be shown to be binding on the conscience.

THE COOLY TRADE.—The Englishman has been so fortunate as to obtain a printed copy of the evidence taken by the Committee, appointed to investigate the subject of the Cooly Trade, from which he has furnished his readers with several extracts. They serve to shew the magnitude of the abuses which have crept into the system, in the first stage of its existence, in the teeth of legislative enactment and magisterial vigilance; and clearly establish the necessity of putting the Report into the hands of the house legislature, before any Act is passed for legalizing the Trade. We hope ourselves to obtain a copy of the Evidence, when we shall not fail to present our readers with an analysis of its contents.

Our Contemporary thinks it was hard in the public to censure the delay which had arisen in the publication of the Report and Evidence, because the labours of the Committee were gratuitous. As we have been among the foremost to chide the delay, we must be allowed to say in our own defence, that the mere circumstance of the services of the Committee not having been paid for in cash, does not appear to be any valid objection to our importunity. The Committees of the House of Commons, upon whose reports almost every legislative enactment at home is founded, are not paid in sterling money. But they are abundantly repaid by the importance and dignity of their office, and by the gratitude of their fellow citizens. And we take the case to be much the same in the present instance. To this Committee was confided the examination of evidence, which was to decide whether a trade, with the same inherent character, and the same nefarious tendencies, as the African Slave Trade, should be allowed to take root in India; whether our provinces should be overgrown with Native agents, alluring the innocent labourer from his field, his home, and his family, across the seas to a distant Colony, where the black man had always been held in a degrading subjection to the white man; whether our ports should be turned into slave marts, and our merchants be degraded to slave dealers. The importance of the question at issue, combined with the confidence and anxious expectations of India, constituted the reward of the Committee; and we are certain that they were felt to be far more valuable than any pecuniary reward which could have been given. To be privileged to act on great occasions; to be the instrument of enacting large benefits, or of arresting the progress of gigantic evils, is of itself a reward of no small value. Considering, therefore, that the Committee was fully and amply repaid, in a far higher sense than if gold had been given them, we used the freedom of animadverting on the delay which had arisen; not, however, out of any unfriendly feeling towards the members, but from a fear lest the report of their enquiries might lose its value by undue detention in this country. We are happy to hear that the delay has arisen solely from the difficulty of arranging so large a mass of papers, and carrying them through the Press. We are still more happy to find, from the latest intelligence, that the question, as to the renewal of the Trade, will not come on before the next Parliamentary Session; and we trust that before it opens, a copy of the Report and Evidence will be in the hands of every member of the two Houses.

DUELLING.—Through the kindness of a friend, to whom we must express our obligations, we were enabled last week to publish the Act which has recently passed the Congress of the United States, to prevent Duelling. It makes not only the act of killing another in a duel, felony, but brands with the same infamy, the sending or accepting of a challenge, and punishes both principals and seconds with imprisonment and confinement to hard labour in the Penitentiary, for a period not exceeding ten, and not short of five years. It also punishes with imprisonment and hard labour, for a shorter term, any attempt to post, as a coward, a man who may have refused to fight a duel. If we are not mistaken, this is the first attempt at direct legislation against this detestable vice; and it reflects great credit on the American Government. It establishes, for once, the superiority of the American Congress, over the British Parliament; for it must be obvious to the most ordinary observer, that our Legislature is not sufficiently advanced in legislative courage, and is not sufficiently ahead of the vulgar prejudices of the day, to fix this brand of infamy on the duellist. If any member were to attempt to bring in such a Bill into Parliament, he would find himself in a miserable minority. It is true that duelling is forbidden; and that if a duel should appear likely to grow out of any proceeding in the House, the Speaker is bound, in courtesy, to order the parties into the custody of the Black Rod, until they engage that the affair shall go no farther. And instances have occurred, in which the two belligerent members have been shut up together for the night; but Parliament has not, as yet, the virtue to pass a law, for sending such men as Mr. Grattan and the Earl of Winchester to the tread-mill for five years; and here the great republic of modern times has the advantage of us. But why did she stop short in this career of benevolence, and condone this Act of Legislation in the district of Columbia? Why did she not make duelling felony throughout the Union, and abolish throughout the land the vile duel a practice, which, of all others, is the most disgraceful to the civilized world? Why did she exhibit to the world the weakness of her Federal form of Government, by this narrow and inefficient reform; and leave us still to look for the general establishment of this benevolent law as to a future blessing, which was contingent, on its passing successfully the gauntlet of twenty-five independent legislatures. Of this we were certain, that whenever the British Legislature shall be so far emancipated from the thrallism in which a false sense of honour binds it, as to make duelling felony, its determination will be exhibited in no partial measure, but will be made obligatory at once, and with equal force, on every Englishman in every part of the globe who lives under the protection of the British flag.

An attempt has recently been made, and with some success, to check this monstrous evil in France. The Courts have condemned, in several instances, the survivor in a duel to pay the debts of the man he had shot, and to maintain and educate his family. Appeals have been carried up against this decision to the higher tribunals, but they have invariably affirmed the judgement of the Lower Courts. This course of procedure has given some check to the murderous practice. Some who were urged into the field by high and chivalrous notions of honour, have found their ardour cool rapidly, when they came to calculate the consequences of shooting their adversary. Sordid considerations of pounds, shillings and pence, have been permitted to quench that thirst of satisfaction for insulted honour, which the duellist would find it more difficult to persuade us was stronger even than the love of life itself. We are thankful for any mitigation of this infamous code of honour, as it is called; and while waiting for the entire abolition of this practice, by the nations who call themselves, by way of pre-eminence, 'the civilized world,' are glad of even this little attempt to stop the effusion of blood. But when will Christendom rise to a level with its knowledge and its privileges? And when will the Christian Go-government of India,—for Christian ought to be, if it is not,—pass an enactment similar to that of the American Congress, and relieve us, in the eyes of the Natives, from the degrading anomaly of pretending to a superiority of civilization, while we continue practices, of which the meanest savage ought to be ashamed? Would this be any violation of the laws of Parliament; or any infringement of those rights and liberties which Britons carry with them, wheresoever they go?

THE JULY MAIL.—Seldom has public expectation been raised higher, or experienced a more miserable disappointment, than in reference to the Mail which arrived at the beginning of this week. Detained long beyond the ordinary period, a variety of conjectures were formed as to the cause of its delay; the most probable of which was supposed to be the blockade of Alexandria, and the suspension of all communication through Egypt; but we find that the detention had no political origin, but arose from the usual obstacles by which intercourse is impeded during the monsoon. Then, it was expected, that the Ministry would again fall to pieces, when they came to pass through the ordeal of the Ballot, which had been made an open question; but the debate passed over, without exciting any other remark; than that its friends had been increased by sixteen, and its opponents, to the number of sixty-two, since the last struggle. And the Ministry stand fast; and are not likely to flud their base of office put in jeopardy for six or seven months to come, at the very least. Then, it was likewise expected, that Mr. Macmahon, on his first attempt to address the House, would be eluded by the 'equal and impartial despotism' declaration, which he had made in India; and falling down on the floor in convulsions, would have been carried out, never to return; but we find, on the contrary, that he made a brilliant speech in favour of that most radical of all measures, the Ballot, and stands higher than ever in the opinion of Liberals. We also looked for some account of the connexion, likely to arise from the report of the Othman crisis; but the intelligence had not reached England; and, finally, we looked for some demonstration of the views of Russia in the East of Europe; and expected to hear of the beginning of those great events, which are to grow out of the maturity of her plans for the establishment of a universal despotism; but the news of the Sultan's defeat had not arrived in London when the Mail left. Here is a string of disappointments fitted to subdue the most ardent spirit of curiosity; yet we look with equal eagerness for the next Mail, which must bring something.

If we look at the intelligence brought on the present occasion, we see nothing on which the mind can rest with complacency. The melancholy death of Lady Flora Hastings, whom some now living in India may remember plucking flowers, in the innocent gaiety of childhood, in the Park at Barrackpore, twenty-five years ago, leaves a bitter impression on the mind. The opposition to the Ministerial Bill for Education, has developed feelings of party and religious hostility to an extent, which leads us almost to despair of seeing the day when England will be able to boast of a well-educated population. When we remember what vast strides her jealous rival, Russia, whose civilization is but of yesterday, has already made in popular education, we feel a more keen sense of the degradation to which party animosities may reduce a noble country. The continued outrages of the Chartists, whose associations would be annihilated by cheap bread, gives cause for no small anxiety. The state of the Money Market, so clearly indicated by the precautionary measures of the Bank, is also a portentous omen; and cannot be viewed without feelings of alarm, more especially when we consider that the intelligence from China will only serve to increase pecuniary embarrassment. The question of a Comprehensive Steam Communication seems also to be retrograding. The Court of Directors have not been conciliated in this measure. They obtain their despatches in good time from Bombay, and care for nothing else; and Her Majesty's Ministers have, evidently, cooled, if, indeed, they ever were warm upon it. The formation of a British India Society gives, it is true, a gleam of hope for this country; but before we can repose any confidence in that body, it must adopt some wiser course than that of assembling to pass such redundant resolutions, as 'that it is established by undoubted authority, that there is much misery and ignorance in India, and that famines are of frequent occurrence;' as though these were grand discoveries, reserved for the year 1839, and unknown to the world till this Society came into existence.

RAILROADS.—Our Correspondent, Publícola, asks, whether stone-roads, consisting of oblong shafts of stone, flattened on the upper surfaces, would not serve instead of railroads. We think not. In portions, at least, of the Madras Presidency, stone may be had, perhaps, for the quarrying, and at small cost for carriage. But in Bengal it is far otherwise. We imagine that in carrying a road from Calcutta to Delhi, iron rails could be laid down cheaper throughout, than blocks of any stone fit for the purpose. And were such a work as an extensive railroad to be entered on, it would be inexhaustible not to take the opportunity of establishing blast furnaces and forges in the country, which being called into existence by the demand for rails, might continue afterwards, for supplying us with every thing that is wanted from them for a great and busy population.

But our Correspondent seems to forget, that the great object of modern railroads is to obtain the rapidity and economy of steam carriage; which two important benefits are inseparable. Now the stone-road he proposes is altogether inapplicable for the locomotive engines and their trains. The greater friction of even the best stone surface would be an enormous hindrance; and what is to keep the locomotive upon the stone blocks? Such a road as Publícola proposes is sometimes used in England. One may be seen in going from London to the West India Docks; and on the turnpike road from Birmingham to London, (which while the parallel railroad was going forward, was undergoing improvements that would cost, it was said, about £70,000) the ascent of some of the hills is facilitated by two rows of stone blocks laid down at one side of the road. But in these cases the only advantage sought, is the slow draught of heavy weights with small force. Between them and railroads there can be no competition.

THE TINNEVELLY GERMAN MISSION.—In January last we gave a statement of the affairs of the Tinniveilly Mission, which we imagined would be a final one. But there had been some reckoning without the host. The Mission, after the death of the excellent Rheims, had been divided into two parts; the one including the congregations and schools to the west and north of Palanacottah; and the other, those to the south and east; and Mr. Schaffter had taken the superintendence of the former division, and Mr. Muller that of the latter. At the date of our last notice, Mr. Schaffter, with his division, had been reunited to the Church Missionary Society, through its Madras Corresponding Committee; and Mr. Muller, with his portion of the Mission, was said to have been received by the London Missionary Society. But his reception was only the act of the Travancore District Corresponding Committee of that Society, and was subject to a reference to the Directors at home: by whom it was not confirmed. The Directors had no objection to receive Mr. Muller into the number of their Missionaries, if he would leave Timnevelly. But they considered it would be unfair to the Church Missionary Society, for them to receive into their connection any part of the Mission that had belonged to that body. And their decision is in accordance with certain principles of mutual non-interference which have recently been adopted by the great Missionary Societies both of England and America. The arrangement is better adapted, we fear, for securing impunity to the offences of the Societies, than for removing real obstructions to their success. But, be that as it may, it throws Mr. Muller, and his portion of the Timnevelly Mission, again upon the general support of Christian people: and we, therefore, beg to renew our recommendation of his case to our friends, and again offer to be the medium of transmitting their donations to Timnevelly.

Mr. Muller has printed a statement, which will be found in another page. We beg to solicit attention to it. Besides Mr. and Mrs. Muller, the Mission includes 65 catechists, and 21 schoolmasters. By their means, Christian worship is conducted in 60 chapels; and 43 schools are taught. Worship is attended by 1,574 families, or 5,039 individuals, in 100 different villages; and 1,100 children are receiving Christian instruction, of whom 100 are girls under the particular superintendence of Mrs. Muller. The monthly expenditure for all this work is 800 Rupees: which we earnestly hope will be supplied with generous promptitude. Mr. Muller's statement is accompanied by a tabular return of all the details of the Mission, which however satisfactory, it does not seem necessary we should reprint.

It will be seen from Mr. Muller's statement, that when his removal from his people was mentioned, as the necessary condition of his joining the London Missionary Society, the Catechists protested that rather than he should do so, they would be content with the humble support the people could render them. This generous offer, however, Mr. Muller could not think of accepting. Now, although the people may be too poor wholly to support their own ministers, we think Mr. Muller ought not to lose the opportunity of making a beginning at least, in that wholesome course, which must be universally adopted, if ever the gospel is truly naturalized in the country. At Timnevelly there is every thing to facilitate such success. The people are possessed of a willing mind; and their preachers have been called to the exercise of their ministerial functions in so natural and wise a manner, that they have not been raised to a scale of living, which would make their support by their fellow Christians a thing of any great difficulty. Let the people do what they can; they will be the happier for the effort; and Christian principle and zeal will soon lead them to tax their strength and industry to do more. In a year or two, their success may be a surprise to themselves, and shew a more excellent way to others than has yet been exemplified in Indian Missions. This is a subject of the last importance, to which we shall soon have occasion again to return. In the meantime, we beg Mr. Muller's careful attention to it. Is it so, that Hindoos can support itself, and Mahomedanism can support itself, but Christianity must lean on extraneous support?

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 19.

The papers state, with some degree of confidence, that Lord Auckland will be in Calcutta in February next, and that His Lordship will return to England in the early part of 1851.—Rumours are afloat that Mr John Keane had thrown up the command of the Army of the Indus, in consequence of Lord Auckland having expressed dissatisfaction at his taking on the Bombay troops with him; in consequence of which, the troops of both Presidencies were put on short allowances for nearly two months.—The assertion of Mr. Bruce, the Superintendent of the Tan Colonies in Assam, that the black and green tea are produced from the same tree, has brought on a discussion in the papers, and a Correspondent brings a long array of authorities to prove that this notion ought to be placed among the "Vulgar Errors." There is the present Vicer Apostolic of Bengal, the Right Rev. the Bishop of Isoropolis, who, having resided for many years in Cochin China, and cultivated tea in his own garden, for the use of his own household, can at once decide the question. His opinion, we think, entirely coincides with that of Mr. Bruce. We are happy to learn from the Correspondent's letter, that the quantity of tea now exported from Batavia, where it has been only recently domesticated, is a hundred and fifty thousand pounds weight a year.—Mr. George Clerk, and the other gentlemen who formed the deputation from Lord Auckland, to the present ruler of the Punjab, had reached Lahore.—Letters from Cabul mention the death of Brigadier Arnold, Colonel of the 10th Lancers. He had been suffering from a complication of internal disorders, arising from the wounds he received at the battle of Quatre Bras.—The same letters state, that Prince Agneta had been formed, to take charge of the plunder obtained at Ghilani; which, it is supposed, will be equal to about a month's income of each officer. Fifteen hundred of the finest horses fell to the captors.—Gleaner's Agra Journal states, that from information fortunately discovered from the documents of an adherent to the deposed Rajah of Bhurpoor, thirteen acres of the Rajah's property will shortly fall to the lot of the conquerors. Thirteen acres! The news is too good to be true. Where has this immense property been concealed? We fear our worthy contemporary has allowed himself to be gulled.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 20.

The July Mail is not yet in. Bombay papers have been received to the 4th instant, but there was no sign of the Mail. Last night the equinoctial gale of the season came on with great violence; and during the whole night, and throughout this day, the deluge of rain has been truly astonishing. If the storm had any range, it cannot but cut up the roads, and still farther impede the post. Changed by the ordinary Mail, it is not till after five days making the trip. (The Directors promised it should be done in ten, some years ago.) When heading under the weight of the London Mail, and dragged through roads cut up by recent torrents of rain, it can scarcely be expected to arrive under eighteen days.—Orders have been issued to the effect, that the ninth, or additional company, ordered to be added to each Regiment, shall, in the case of thirty-seven Regiments now on foreign service, or at a distance from recruiting ground, be formed into four depots.—The August number of the Calcutta Monthly Journal contains an original article on the statistics of Deyra Dhoon, which, among a mass of interesting facts, states that Mr. Balle has succeeded in brewing beer, which is sold at four Rupees and a half, per dozen, and that a great many people prefer his beer to English.—Loodianah papers state, that Capt. Nuttall has been deputed to the Sheikh capital, to obtain permission for the British army to return from Cabul through the Punjab. The Rajah Kuruck Sing is said to have granted this on three conditions; first, that on the line of march the crops should not be damaged; secondly, that oxen should not be slaughtered; and, thirdly, that no such request should ever be made again.—Sir Edward Ryan is expected to pass through Agra on his way to Simla.—We regret much to announce the death, at the Cape, of Dr. Benister, of the Madras Medical Establishment, a man greatly esteemed for his benevolent and evangelical exertions.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.

This is the last day for transmitting letters to England by the Mail, which leaves Bombay early next month; so that our infinite mercification, the long over-sea July Mail has not arrived.—Maritime papers state, that Sir William Nicholas has strongly recommended to Her Majesty's Ministers to allow the importation of our Coolies into the Mauritius; and pending their decision, has allowed free labourers to be introduced from Madagascar, where every labourer is the slave of some Chief. We regret that whether he will not have done enough in this step to merit his place. The Governor describes the Colony, as one whole, but flourishing; but the consanguineous brigandage, which, as they were expected to do; and they have become immediately attached to drink; and hence they have greater power nor inclination to put deposits into the Savings' Bank.—The first Brigade of Infantry, under Brigadier Sale, the 2nd Cavalry, the Camel Battery, and Timing's troop of Horse Artillery, are, it is settled, to remain at Cabul; the rest of the Bengal troops start, on their return, in the beginning of October; the second Brigade will also not return to Hindoostan this year; the Bombay troops will return via Candahar and Khelat, and bring Mehrab Khan to reason. Sir John Keane comes on to Ferozepore, and drops down the Indus to Tatta, and thence proceeds to Bombay.—A vessel of 376 tons, belonging to Baboo Shroemah Mulik, is to be launched at Howrah next Wednesday, the 15th.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23.

The long expected July Mail has, at length, reached Calcutta, and letters and papers to the 14th of that month have been received.—The Patriot King which left Liverpool on the 21st of June, is announced as having reached Kedgee yesterday; so that if the July Mail had not come in at the nick of time, we should have had five days later intelligence by a sailing vessel than by steam.—Letters from Arracan state, that the Burmese were advancing and making defence as they came on; that all communications of a friendly nature had been suspended, and that the pillars, who had crossed the boundary, had returned from the Burmese territories in fear and trembling. The port of Arracan, which some few days before contained only three or four vessels, was beginning to be crowded with shipping, all laden with Madras cloths, bullion, coconuts and coconut oil.—The Officers sent in pursuit of Dost Mahomed Khan, have returned without having accomplished their object. Meer Hadjee, the Commandant of the Afghans, who accompanied them, is suspected of having acted a double part. He declared, on the line of march, that if his troops were to come up with Dost Mahomed, they would be more likely to join than to fight him.—The Alliance sent to Herat, under Major Todd, was not expected to reach that place before the 26th of July. It is said that Capt. Pottinger has advised the pursuit of Dost Mahomed to be continued to Balk, as he apprehends the junction of some Russian and Persian troops at that place.—At the meeting of the Proprietors of the Bengal Bank held last week, it was resolved that all farther realization by the Bank of Interest on public securities, on behalf of contributors, should cease under the idea that it would be exceeding the powers granted by the Charter.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24.

The papers of this day are occupied with the intelligence brought by the Mail, to the almost entire exclusion of local news.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25.

Up to last evening, the second instalment of the Overland Mail had not reached Calcutta. We are, therefore, still in total ignorance of the progress of events in the East of Europe; nor have we yet learned the cause of the delay in the arrival of the Mail.—The Water Witch, which took the Calcutta Mails to Aden, made a glorious passage from the Sand Heads to that port, in thirty-six days; and this in the very height of the monsoon. The sailing vessel which took the Bombay packets to Aden was forty-one days from port to port. The successful voyage which have been made by the Ariel and the Water Witch, not lead to the full conviction, that the monsoon may not only be stemmed, but overcome, by a Steamer starting from Calcutta.—The Seringapatam has arrived at Madras in seventy-three days from England, and has thus put that Presidency in possession of eleven days later intelligence than had been received by steam.—The arrangements respecting the Army of the Indus, now at Cabul, are this day given in the Englishman. A very considerable portion of the troops will remain at Cabul, Candahar, and in the Valley of Shawl, while the rest return to the Western Provinces or Bombay.—A regular post having now been established from Afghanistan to Hindostan, letters have been received at Agra in twenty-one days, direct from Cabul; but letters from Cabul have been received in Calcutta in twenty-seven days.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

The long expected July Mail, with intelligence to the 15th of that month, reached Calcutta on Sunday evening last. The Ministry still continued in their seats, notwithstanding the oft-repeated prophecies of their downfall; and there appears to be no hope for their opponents before the next Session of Parliament.

Sir Charles Metcalfe has been gazetted Governor of Jamaica; and Sir Lionel Smith goes out as Governor to the Mauritius. The Bill for the future government of Jamaica, after having passed the Commons, was severely treated by the Lords, who sent it back with considerable mutilations; and in this state it passed into law. Sir Charles will find no little difference between the Governor Generalship of India, and the government of Jamaica.

The Government Bill for the appropriation of £30,000 to the purposes of national education, on a broad and liberal basis, was fiercely contested in the Commons. The division upon it in one stage gave them a majority of only five; and it finally passed by a majority of only two. Being a money bill, the Lords could not interfere with it; but a motion for an Address to the Queen was made, requesting her not to apply the money to the objects contemplated. In the debate which ensued, much intemperate feeling was displayed, but the vote was carried by a large majority of 275 to 273; and it was also ordered that the House should go up with it in a body to Her Majesty. Her Majesty rebuked them for their officiousness, and declared that she would lay out the funds voted by the Commons for public education, under the direction of a Committee of the Privy Council, with due respect to the rights of conscience, and with a faithful attention to the security of the Established Church.

The Ministry have determined to give the Universal Penny Post Plan a fair trial, on Parliament guaranteeing to make good any deficiency of revenue which may arise from its operation.

Lady Flora Hastings died on the 6th of July, of a complaint in the liver; but there can be no doubt that her death was hastened by the slanders in which she had been exposed. The Queen showed the most affectionate solicitude in her case, postponed the entertainment she had intended to give on the anniversary of her Coronation, and was most deeply affected when her death was announced. Her remains were conveyed to Scotland in a Steamer, to be carried from Edinburgh to London Castle.

The Comprehensive Steam Communication Plan appears to be in statis quo. Sir John Hobhouse is lukewarm, and the Directors are hostile; though that hostility is varied over with a coating of political prudence. The Company to be formed in London will not, it appears, proceed to action till the Court of Directors guarantee a hundred thousand a year; and the Court wish to see the plan in operation before they make any promise. There can, however, be no doubt, that the Queen of the East will not be allowed to lie idle at Calcutta, but be assuredly sent to look the monsoon in the face next season.

Mr. H. T. Prinsep has been nominated Provisional Member of the Council of India.

Indian subjects are beginning to occupy an increasing share of attention. Lord Brougham has moved for certain papers connected with the resurrections now in progress. The British India Society is less stirring itself, and passed certain resolutions, from which we gather that India will no longer be treated with that neglect which she has so long experienced. One part of the resolutions is somewhat amusing. We find it moved by Sir Charles Forbes at the Society, that the revenue is decreasing; while at the same time in his place at the India House, he has been reproaching Government with having a surplus revenue of nine or ten millions in its Indian coffers.

In respect of the collision between the House of Commons and the Court of Queen's Bench; the members of the former seem determined to maintain their privileges. On the motion of Lord John Russell, the House resolved not to take any steps to impede the execution of the order of the Queen's Bench; but to take effectual measures for protecting their own franchises and privileges, among the most valuable of which is the liberty of publishing the reports of their Committees, and the Debates.

No account of the defeat of the Turkish troops, by Mahomed Ali, had reached England, when the Mail came away; but we learn that the Sultan had declared Mahomed Ali and his son deposed from the government of Egypt and Syria; and ordered them to be duly excommunicated in all the Mosques in his dominions.

Marshal Ruit, the Prime Minister of France, has declared that there appears nothing in the political horizon likely to disturb the cordial amity which exists between France and England.

As it regards the relations between Russia and England, every thing appears to be calm and smooth; the affairs of Egypt and Turkey will, however, bring the question to an issue. Viekovitch, the Russian Envoy, who was sent to stir up Dost Mahomed in quarrel with us, after an interview with Prince Kosselrod, went home and shot himself, having first destroyed all his papers.

The Court of Directors have taken a decisive step to remove the grievances under which Indian commerce suffers, by inequality of duties; and have drawn up a petition to Parliament, requesting that the trade of this country may have the same common chance of improvement with that of other Colonies, by equalizing them. We shall give the petition next week.

The Money Market appears to be in a very unsatisfactory state. The accounts up to the latest date, are of an alarming nature. The Bank of England had been obliged to raise its discounts to  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent.; and after that to sell out some of its dead stock to the extent of half a million sterling. We shall, therefore, look for the August Mail with some anxiety.

An American Schooner has been seized by an English Colonel, the Governor of Bruckville; but was immediately after restored. This little circumstance led to much political negotiation, but was not likely to lead to hostilities.

Mr. Oswald has been returned for Glasgow.

The Ballot, though made an open question, was lost on Mr. Grote's annual debate, by a majority of 117. It appears that the Ballot has gained sixteen additional supporters in the last twelve months; but that the opponents of that measure have gained more than three times that number of adherents.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sum for the Friend of India:—

TEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

A BRIEF STATEMENT OF THE GERMAN EVANGELICAL MISSION IN TINSKVELLY, AT THE END OF JUNE, 1839.

Our friends are acquainted with the changes which have taken place in the Mission since the removal of our much lamented brother Rheuvius. Mr. Schaffter rejoined the Church Missionary Society, with the Catechists, Converts, and Schools to the west and north of Palamattah. As this step rendered it difficult for me to carry on the remaining part of the G. E. M. being alone, I thought it advisable to apply to the Travancore District Committee of the London Missionary Society to be received with the Catechists, Congregations, and Schools south and east of Palamattah, into connexion with that Society. The Committee unanimously complied with my request, sending a reference to the Directors of the L. M. S. in England. The Directors, not concurring in the proceedings of the T. D. Committee, I was brought into great perplexities, not so much regarding myself, but more as respects the poor people. The Directors of the L. M. S. indeed had no objection to receive me into their connexion, provided I left Tinskvelly; but in this case, what was to become of the poor people? This question gave me a great deal of anxiety; however I was enabled to rest my hopes upon the Lord, and wait patiently for his direction. I called the Catechists and others together to acquaint them with the Director's answer. But before I did so, they having already heard of what had happened, came in a body, requesting me to stay with them, at the same time promising to go on in their work as before, even if I should not be able to give them any salary. As they expressed the same mind the following day when I met them, I proceeded to speak freely and faithfully to them about the trials and difficulties which might befall me, and told them, that this month they would receive their salary as usual, but as for the next month I knew of no cash either for them or for me. However, they thought we had better venture on the Lord in humble faith and reliance on his promises. I then dismissed them to their stations, telling them to consider well and prayerfully with their congregations, what we had been talking about to-day; and at the end of the month we would then come to a final conclusion. When they assembled at the end of the month I found them still of the same mind. Although I had strong reasons to apprehend that the confidence of many of our former friends was shaken by the unexpected changes which had taken place in the Mission, yet the catechists having come forward in this manner, I felt it to be my imperative duty to comply with their request and remain in my post. We cast ourselves fresh upon the Lord, looking to him and his people for support; and praised be his holy Name he has put it into the hearts of his children to encourage and strengthen our feeble hands up to this moment; and shall we not also trust him for the future? To Him be glory for ever!

I now proceed to give a brief account of the present state of the Mission, and in so doing I shall follow the same order as has been usual in the half yearly Reports of the German Evangelical Mission. I therefore begin with:

1. Missionaries. In respect to this point I can only express my regret that various circumstances prevented Mr. Lechler from rejoining me. As it will appear from No. 2, this Mission requires at least two more efficient labourers, in order that the catechists, congregations, and schools may be properly superintended. I say this, as it is my full conviction, that if a Missionary has more than about 30 catechists, as many congregations and schools, he cannot do justice to his work; and he has hardly any time left for the preaching of the gospel to the heathen around him. Situated as I at present am, I can only make known my want of one or two fellow-labourers to the Lord of the harvest. May he speedily send faithful labourers into his vineyard! I have written however to Germany about the subject, but of course do not yet know with what success my application for a helper may meet. The Lord is able also in this respect to do more and better than we are able to ask or to think.

2. Congregations. According to the list made up at the end of last month, and which is annexed to this Report, there are 25 present in connexion with the Mission 1374 families or 5699 souls. The Total at the end of last year was 1349 Ditto or 4447 ditto, being an increase during the last six months of 225 families or 502 souls. These 1374 families are living in 100 villages. Upon the whole I am thankful to say that there is peace among the congregations, and I earnestly hope and pray it may continue so. The above mentioned total of souls consists of

1. Baptized Men, ... ..	255
Do. Women, ... ..	184
Do. Children, ... ..	194
	617
2. Candidates for baptism, Via.
Men, ... ..	1268
Women, ... ..	1219
Children, ... ..	1940
Total, ... ..	5099

Comparing with this, the list of December last, there has been increase of baptized men 36, women 13, children 21; in all 69 persons. The Lord's Supper is administered every month at Sarsasapuram, at which not only most of the catechists, but also members of the congregations attend. My journeys among the congregations have, I humbly trust, been beneficial to the people as well as to myself. Though one sees and finds many things which are not according to the gospel, and justly grieved about it, yet it would be wrong not to mention that on the whole they are desirous of being fed with the word of God, and of laying aside their sinful habits. It is my daily prayer to the Lord to pour down his holy spirit on them, that they may all grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is not in man's power to convert a soul, we can only direct them to Jesus, and place the motion of grace, as heild out to us in the Gospel, before them. It is our duty and our privilege to plant and to water, but the Lord must give the increase.

3. Catechists. At the end of last year there were 62 catechists; now there are 65, including inspecting catechists and assistants; being an increase of 3. The reason why more catechists were required, there being an increase of 563 souls among the congregations, is simply this, that the increase has principally taken place in old congregations; the number of new villages being not more than about 5 or 6. From one or two villages I was obliged to remove the catechists to other stations, as the people had either left the place to settle somewhere else, or I am sorry to say, had returned to heathenism. I regret to state that I was under the necessity of dismissing two catechists on account of improper conduct, and one because he was not qualified for his office. The rest are going on as well as can be expected from poor sinful creatures as we are. The grace of God is no doubt sufficient for us all, but how backward and indolent we sometimes are to apply for that grace. They have had their exercises as formerly; they learn every month a part of 4 chapters by heart, which is explained to them at the monthly meeting; besides which, I have lately commenced instructing catechists near Sarsasapuram two or three times a month, and there in the end once or twice for a couple of hours, to edify and build ourselves up in our most holy faith, by reading the word of God and meditating upon it. I have commenced the Epistle to the Romans with them, and though we have only met a few times we have found that it is good thus to commune with, and draw nigh unto our reconciled Father in Jesus our Saviour.

4. Schools. At the end of last year there were 16 school and industrial masters, 18 regular schools by catechists with masters; now there are 21 schoolmaster's schools, and 23 catechist schools, in all therefore 43. In these schools about 1100 children are receiving christian instruction; 100 of whom are girls under the particular superintendence of Mrs. Muller. For their encouragement to attend school, as stated in the last Report, they receive monthly a quantity of cotton to spin into thread. This employment will prepare them to support themselves in future life, while the small portion of their labour is at present given to their parents as some compensation for the loss of their children's services while attending the school. Mrs. Muller is very desirous of having a boarding school for girls under her own inspection in the mission compound; any number of children could be accommodated, if funds only were provided. The attention of the friends and promoters of female education in India is respectfully called to this important object, and their aid most earnestly solicited. The support of one child, including tuition, books, &c. &c. is about 24 Rupees per annum. Of the 81 schoolmasters and 10 others, 14 are Christians, the rest are heathen, but they are generally well instructed in the principles of christianity, and most of them are also well inclined towards it. The inspecting schoolmaster is a christian, and discharges his duties to my satisfaction. Like the catechists, they learn every month a portion of scripture by heart, which is explained to them at the monthly meeting. They are at present learning the Acts of the Apostles. With many of them it is only case which hinders them from embracing the truth openly.

5. Preparandi. In this class there have been during the last half year from 8 to 12 persons, partly christian, preparing for immediate services among the congregations, and partly heathen, preparing to be schoolmasters. The latter are usually but one or two. They are all on the premises, and are daily instructed, chiefly in the word of God and in doctrinal and historical catechisms. They have also had some exercises in Chronology and Geography, as also in Tamil Grammar. They learn daily a portion of scripture by heart, which is explained to them. They are at present going through the Epistles to the Corinthians. At the evening meetings for prayer the harmony of the Gospels is read and explained to them. Sarkunan, the principal teacher of our late seminary, renders me great assistance in this department.

6. Pianotes. The monthly expenditure for the Pianotes, myself and finally included, amounts to about 800 Rupees, a small sum indeed in proportion to the work; but not so, when it is considered that we, not being connected with any Society have to look to individuals for it; and therefore we would earnestly solicit the kind assistance of such of the Lord's people whom he has blessed with means so to do. But it has been remarked, "Why do you write for money, when your catechists promised you to go on in their work as before, whether you could give them salary or not?" But I would ask whether it is right to leave the laborer, who is worthy of his hire, to suffer want? as I know that the circumstances of the people are too poor to support their teachers. Or should he be necessitated to spend his time and strength, which he otherwise would spend in the Lord's service in providing for the support of himself and family, while it is the privilege and duty of the children of God to promote their Redeemer's cause? It must also be remembered, that exclusive of our personal support, we want aid for erecting prayer-houses, procuring books for the schools, catechists, preparandi, &c. &c., not forgetting the desirableness of having a girl's school in the Missions compound, as was mentioned to No. 4. I would therefore say, what thy hand findeth to do, do it quickly, cheerfully, liberally, for it is more blessed to give than to receive.

Conclusion. At the end of the year, if the Lord please, I intend to give an account of the income and expenditure for this Mission, as also of the working of the Native Societies mentioned in last Report. I now conclude with commending myself, catechists, congregations, schools, preparandi, &c. &c., to the prayers and sympathy of the christian church. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ dwell in us richly, and may we all be enabled to live in his glory. Amen and Amen.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

GOVERNMENT PATNA NEW CITY DISPENSARY.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—Having witnessed the efficient medical aid now afforded to the sick poor at the Government Patna New City Dispensary, I have been induced to bring it to the notice of the public, through your valuable journal, should you think it worth insertion. Doubtless, the public has been, and will be, greatly benefited from the establishment of such an excellent and benevolent Institution; and there is no question, but many lives are prolonged hereby. Seeing that on the one hand the Native Hakeems and Vaidas are, in general, ignorant of their profession; and on the other, that very many of the people are so poor, as not to be able to pay for medical advice, &c.

I should not omit to state a fact, which shows, as well the high esteem in which the establishment is generally held, as the great good conferred on the public; that the Native Hakeems and Vaidas have nearly lost all their practice, with the exception of some of the rich and more prejudiced Natives.

In the Dispensary, the sick may be daily seen in crowds; and the daily average of attendance is three hundred patients, more or less. Nor do the sick of the city only attend, but of the villages around; and some come from great distances, having heard of the great skill and success of the Native Medical Officer in charge of the Institution, from those who have been under his judicious treatment. I think it justice to Ram Eshwer Awasthee, (Native Medical Officer in charge,) to state that he is punctual and diligent in his attendance on the sick, and kind in his manner towards them; a perseverance in which will not fail to obtain for him general respect and confidence.

I have been a resident in Patna for 60 years, but have never known the sick poor so cared for, or benefited, as at present; and it does great credit to the individuals who, with great zeal, watch over its interest.

To our liberal Government of India we can make no better return, than by thus publicly acknowledging our hearty thanks for the great blessings conferred on the sick of their subjects, from the establishment of this highly valuable Institution.

NOTES.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—I am one of your constant readers; and, moreover, one who professionally administers oaths; and witness every day, with pain and disgust, the sacred principle of truth trampled with, and profaned by poor wretches, who know nothing of its Divine origin or inherent beauty of truth—nor yet of the conventional brand of infamy that men have attached to falsehood. How can such do otherwise than lie?

I am an anti-oath-taker, and would be glad to see the custom totally abolished. The communication of your Correspondent T. in your paper of the 5th instant, led me to turn to Sect. 23, Regulation VIII. of 1803. There it is seen that the Court of Nizamut Adsul-huk having consulted the Cawad-ul-Usul and Muftees, were told that an oath "was not required to give validity to evidence in judicial cases." The inquiry of another of your Correspondents, Index, therefore, forcibly recurs. "What strange passion for oaths could have made the first legislators for British India, graft this novelty upon the Mahomedan law, which they adopted as their system of Criminal Justice?" The love of oath-taking, perceptible in English law and English institutions, is most extraordinary. Whence did it arise? Was it from exuberance of religious feeling, or the total absence of it? It seems difficult to say. I think it may be rather traced to profundeness, and want of due reverence for the holy name of God, than to an habitual solemn impression of His presence and omniscience. Truly, it is most irreverent practice, this ordinary swearing in Courts of Justice, and highly offensive it must be to God, whether it be the sacredness of the Bible, or the supposititious sanctity of the Tamhu Tordhee that is violated. Is it not admirable that the Almighty should be obeyed, and His Holy name appealed to, on occasions of the sordid and paltry affairs of interest and crime, that, for the most part, occupy human tribunals? If, through your exertions, or those of any lover of truth and duty, this profane practice can be put out of use, it must be hailed with joy by all right-thinking persons. It is difficult to amplify the feeling that makes the Natives of this country shrink from taking an oath. Oath to see their manner and expression, when the oath is tendered to them, might almost think that it was a sense of tangential shame at being thought capable of telling a lie, or to need the bond of an oath, in order to their declaring the truth; but we know this cannot be the case, as falsehood and delusion are the element they have breathed in from their infancy. We are rather, I think, to look for the cause, in the little value they set upon truth, which is utterly de vil pris amongst them. Any evidence is thought good enough to sustain a cause by, and the act of giving testimony has come to be considered a disgraceful and creditable one. It is impossible to conceive a more stupid and degraded state of moral feeling among any set of people, not actually on the level of savage life.

Having contributed my mite of protest against this evil custom,

I remain, Sirs, your very obedient servant,

JUDEx.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—An old Healer, in one of your late numbers, hints that you should occasionally repeat one of your suggestions to the effect, that Natural Theology should be taught in the Government

Schools; and I beg to express my humble concurrence in the suggestion. Natural Theology may be taught indirectly, and even directly, without alarming the religious principles of the people; for in shewing, through the medium of science, the benevolent and beautiful adaptation of God's works; as we may, without even mentioning the divine name, exalt, until it becomes an unconscious worship, the idea of Him who is the fountain of all science; and thus we may at one and the same time promote, apart from particular avowed and formularies of worship, a more exalted sentiment, and an acquirement of that science, in which the perfections of the Deity are best and most obviously mirrored forth.

As to the Sanskrit College, to which your Correspondent particularly refers, I fear that it is becoming more and more a mere hot-bed for pedantry, and for the perpetuation of monstrous mythology, and the demoralizing tenets therein inculcated. It truly grieves the heart to think what might be done instead of this.

Your Correspondent also suggests, that by extracting, in the original Sanskrit, for the pupils, the few passages of truth therein to be found, we might thereby prove to them, the corresponding truths which we would teach them; but I venture to think that the proposed object and means are rather trivial; but I heartily concur in his general idea of enabling the pupils to scrutinize the Purāṇa, when the question is one of more moral or intellectual importance; and I think that this idea may be amplified and extended to a very great degree. I humbly think, that in all cases, the doctrine of the Master and the Pupil (nay, even of the Editor,) will be much influenced by the intelligence of those to whom his doctrine is addressed; and that (has even the religion of a country depends more on the intelligence of the lower, than that of the higher orders. Lord Bacon has said, that "the master of superstition is the people." Indeed, nothing that they will not believe, will generally be preached. And does not this point out the absolute and immediate necessity for our parading, with means and motives of primary education, the common people on whose consent the spread of good doctrine is thus to depend? Let this be done, and higher education will be a spontaneous growth. The mere desire of the higher, to be distinguished from the common people, will effect it.

Why is not the above done? I will undertake to answer my own question—because primary education to the many is not so abhorred in its first effects, as fine and transcendental education to the few. Truly, Yorick's gift of a mazarine to the starving was, in the idea suggested by the Education Committee and the Government, who give the luxuries of education to the few, and withhold the substantials of education from the many. They are not diffusing permanent, and all-pervading light, but are gratifying themselves with the avancement of ornate decorations of lightning, which will be "magnificently lost" and swallowed up in the universal darkness which is around.

Your Correspondent is also an advocate for teaching through the English language; but by giving a page of Adam Smith to translate, he may convince himself that the Natives only acquire bastard English; and that they are many years in acquiring even that; and the English language is thence a foul, narrow, difficult, and tedious channel for the diffusion of knowledge; and as to the Natives reading, reciting, and doing all but understanding Shakespeare, which some of them say is "too much fine," such parrotting is nothing, more or less, than what old Cobbett used to call "intense humbug;" and the Government should really interfere.

Yours,
CASSAGRA.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Your recent article on Rail-roads, induces me to suggest, whether the object in view might not be attained by stone-roads, consisting of oblong shafts of stone, not grooved, but flat.

* To illustrate in how small a degree intelligence descends, and how it can be choked by the ignorance of the multitude, observe how little Oxford and Cambridge did to dispel the general darkness of the age; and how little the intelligence of even the Archbishop of Canterbury did to illuminate the wretches who, at Canterbury, lately believed that Thom was Jesus Christ. Even Lord Bacon believed in witchcraft; so choked was his own intelligence, by the under growth of ignorance which surrounded him.

tended at the upper surface, whereas the wheels of the various vehicles are to revolve.

Such roads would not require any particular formation of wheels; and, therefore, the stones might be prearranged at such parts of the line as might be particularly unfavourable to the work; and on these parts the vehicles might travel as heretofore. Thus also a disarrangement in one part of the line need not, as in iron rail-roads, affect the whole undertaking.

The work would also be much cheaper than iron rail-roads; and in regard to this I may mention, that stone cutting seems a particularly suitable work for convicts; as in this work their labour can be accurately measured; and their employment in this would not interfere, as at present, with the general industry of the place.

Furthermore; if the head quarters of the work be at one or more quarries in the line, such part of the line as was completed, would facilitate the conveyance of stone to the other parts.

Yours,
PUBLISHED.

P. S. One obvious objection to all such projects, is the extreme depth to which the monies would suffer the soil; and another objection to the undertaking is, that it will not, in a special degree, benefit, what one of your correspondents emphatically calls, "the favoured caste."

RELIGIOUS.

AMERICAN BAPTIST BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.—Review of the 25th Annual Report of the Board, for the year ending April 15, 1880.—Missionary have been established by the Board, among twelve of the Indian tribes; in France, Germany, and Greece; in Liberia, among the Boas; in Burmah, among the Burmese, Kachins, and Peguans; in Arracan, Siam, and China, among the Annamese and Khamtis, or Silyans, and the Telugues.—Total, twenty-five.

Connected with the missions, are sixty-six stations, including twenty-nine out-stations. Fifteen stations are among the Indian tribes, sixteen in Europe, two in Africa, and thirty-two in Asia. One mission, the Omaha, is suspended, and several stations, including those among the Cherokees, are temporarily vacated, or transferred.

The number of missionaries and assistants is one hundred and six; forty-three of whom are preachers, five preachers and printers, one a printer, three school teachers, one a farmer, and thirty-three female assistants. Of native preachers and assistants there are 85. Total, 191, viz.

Three preachers, nine assistants and fifteen native assistants, have entered the service of the Board during the past year; one preacher, two female assistants, and one native assistant have retired from their connection; one female assistant missionary has died. The aggregate increase of laborers is 22.

The number of churches is forty-five, embracing about 2,000 members; and of baptisms reported during the year, 570.

There are sixty-eight schools, (reported,) containing from 1,200 to 1,500 pupils.

Printing has been executed in fourteen languages, amounting, in the years 1876 and 1877, to $4,000,000 pp. Two founts of type and a printing-press have been added to the printing department in Siam, and a fount of type prepared for printing in Siam. Other founts are in course of preparation.

The receipts of the Board during the year ending April 15, 1880, were dollars 88,340-73, and the expenditures for the same period, dollars 110,190-74—deficiency of receipts, dollars 21,849-10. On the other hand, the receipts, compared with those of the previous year, have increased by about dollars 25,000, and the comparative deficiency decreased by dollars 21,000.

Conclusion.—In the events of the year which has just passed under review, the Board recognize abundant cause of grateful acknowledgement, and of cheerful trust in God. Our beloved brethren abroad, notwithstanding the distress and embarrassment resulting from political commotion and persecution, and from sickness and bereavement, have been enabled to prosecute their labours with a good degree of constancy, and with decided marks of progress. At some stations recently established, important advances have been made in preparations for future usefulness. At others, while provision for future enlargement has been a subject of universal effort, delightful occasion has frequently presented for gathering up the fruits of former years; so that they who planted and they who reap have rejoiced together.

At home, though all has not been accomplished which was desired, enough has been done to preclude despondency and excite to more vigorous endeavours. Information respecting the state of the leathers and the necessities of the missions, has been more extensively diffused than in former years, and a wider and deeper sympathy awakened among the churches. More fervent prayer has been offered to God, and more liberal contributions made to the treasury. On the other hand, it should be remembered that, for the necessities of the year to come, the lowest adequate sum is an increase of dollars 20,000 upon the income of last year. Our receipts must be greatly enlarged, not merely to continue our operations at their present stage of efficiency, but to preserve the faith of the Board inviolate, and maintain its credit unimpaired. To the present moment the Board are unembarrassed with debt. Let them not be compelled to give back from this just and honourable position. Superadded to this consideration, is the importance of reinforcing the missions. Additional funds are urgently needed at several of the stations among the Indians. To each of the missions to France, Greece, and West Africa, one or more mission families might be immediately joined, to the great encouragement of the brethren now labouring in those fields, and the increase of their efficiency. The necessities of the missions in Asia, especially of those to Assam and the Teloupoos, make yet stronger appeals to the sympathies of the churches, and urge to whatever sacrifices are requisite for their speedy relief and enlargement. For all the millions of Assam and the Teloupoos, there are now labouring, in connection with the Board, but four mission families. In the missions of earlier date, where preparations are more ripe for effective labour, and the openings for new stations innumerable, the necessity for speedy reinforcement is scarcely less imperative. The fields are white unto the harvest, and the labourers are exceedingly few. But there are labourers qualified and seeking to enter those fields. Several are waiting to be sent, but are detained for the want of pecuniary means. How long shall be the period of their detention? The churches are not unimpaired, nor has the time yet come to restrict our operations. Pray for the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth more labourers into his harvest; and let prayer lead to effort, earnest, united, determined effort, that the treasury of the Lord may be full.

MISCELLANEOUS.

✶ FORTUNE TELLER.—Yesterday afternoon, a very pretty young woman, named Louise Kraft, was brought before Justice Merritt, charged with the crime of fortune telling on a large scale. She resides at No. 8, Chryslie Street, and has issued cards, in which she styles herself a professed fortune teller, and one of these having fallen into the hands of a gentleman connected with the Police, he went thither, and having first rubbed some silver in the palm of her hand, he had his fortune told, and was promised more even than he wished to have. He made the necessary affidavit, on which a warrant was granted, and she was arrested. She did not pretend to deny the charge; and added, that she did not, of course, pretend to foretell events, but if any person believed she could, and was willing and foolish enough to pay their money for what she knew, she was willing to take it. She was convicted as being a disorderly person, and was required to give bail for good behavior for one year, in dollars 500, which she did, and was discharged. Two others, of the same stamp, named Maguin and Crelinger, were also brought up, and similarly disposed. This is a good more in Justice Merritt, as these women are regular nuisances, and do more mischief among the young females in this city, than is readily imagined; and some of them are even bold, so to issue cards which they give to boys to hand to respectable ladies in the street.—N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

APRIL.—This fickle month (April) has just shown us her face, lit up with a bewitching smile, and despite of her past caprices, many have already been smitten with love. How many have had their wits quickened by being made 'April Fools,' according to old usage, we do not know. We have heard of quick ones upon the credulous, by one of our people, which came out on Monday morning, with so account of a wild man, nine feet high, to be exhibited somewhere gratuitously for that day, which sent crowds to the place to peep at the new wonder.

But the first day of the present April, opens a rare era to our State. By the statute of 1838, all dram-selling is to cease from that day forth. And we have now cheering hope that this all-important principle in the policy of our State legislation on the subject of licenses, will be preserved, since the first of April has passed, and our legislators have not yet been taken in the snare which have been so thickly set for them. We have been told about the impossibility of enforcing the law, the necessity of bayonets and various other things, but we have yet been mercifully preserved.

Propositions in abundance have been made to 'compromise' away all that is essential to the law of 1838, and what is passing strange, that law has been assailed with the utmost violence, and no one seems ready to step forward in its defence. The friends of reform in this matter, must stand by that law, and vindicate its wholesome provisions if they are not willing to see all which legislation has done frittered away. It is doubtful whether they could make a better one, and the people have expressed their decided approbation of this. What we have witnessed at exceedingly, is, that no one in the legislature has come out and decidedly advocated that law, just as it stands. The retailers hate it most cordially, as we should expect, but we believe the community will sustain it, if members of the House themselves do not set the example of violation. It must be distressing to every friend of morality, temperance, and law, to hear these men, at the fountain of legislative authority, boldly assert that the present law must be obeyed. If legislators take such a course, what are we to expect of lawless, interested retailers?—Christian Watchman.

EXPENDITURE OF THE UNITED STATES.—According to the report made by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as published in the National Intelligencer, appropriations were made during the late session of Congress to the amount of dollars 26,692, 242-78, for the following objects, viz.—		Dollars.

THE VILLAGE OF KLENNIG.—All our readers probably are aware that there exists about three miles from North Adams a German village named Klennig; but we have reason to think that this interesting life settlement is not so well known among us as it deserves to be. Klennig is situated on the northern side of the Terrors, on the estate of George Fife Angus, Esq. Like Adelaide, it is surrounded with noble trees, and from many points commands near views of our magnificent range of mountains. The river winds past it, and conveys for the season a considerable depth of water. An air of severity pervades the spot, which is exactly such an one as the imagination would portray as the retreat of persecuted piety.

The industry and quiet perseverance of the German character have been fully developed in Kilnisch. Four or five months only have elapsed since the hand of man began there to efface the features of the wilderness, yet nearly thirty houses have already been erected—and good and spacious houses some of them are. All are neat, clean, and comfortable. They are built mostly of pine, or of unhewn bricks which have been hardened by the sun. The more humble cottages consist of hewnwood and thatch.

The sloping bank of the river is covered with gardens. These consist of small unfenced plots of ground separated by narrow paths. Considering that the season most favourable for gardening has not yet commenced, the number of vegetables which the Germans have at the present moment under culture affords strong proof of their industry. Among these are lettuce, potatoes, cucumbers, French, broad, and scarlet beans, carrots, turnips, onions, radishes, spinach, brocoli, cabbage, and green peas; also, melons, maize, mangel wurzel, mustard and cress, and a few flowers.

The inhabitants themselves are not the least interesting subjects for contemplation. The visitor will find them, one and all, as busy and cheerful as English bees in the spring season. Out of doors they are weeding, or watering, or building, or fishing, milking, washing, cutting wood, or carrying water. Within doors the housewife piles her domestic toil with equal assiduity. She is engaged in bread making, butter making, cooking, cleaning, or some such occupation. Not a man is idle. Even the children who are too small to work, yet large enough to learn, will be found, in ordinary school hours, receiving the tuition of their excellent and indefatigable pastor.

The visitor will be struck by the obliging dispositions and courteous manners of the people. The most peasant raises his hat as he passes you, and bows with an air equally removed from coarseness and servility. The female, although perhaps bending under a load of wood, has a smile, and some other expression of respectful courtesy to offer the passing stranger. Even the few natives who assist them in some of their labours, appear to have imbibed their spirit, being retiring and unobtrusive. We do not disparage our labouring fellow countrymen in Adelaide when we say that they may learn one or two valuable lessons from our German brethren in Kilnisch.

We trust these observations will be thought out of place. We do think our neighbours are entitled to much consideration from us. Driven from their native country, because they would not yield to that worst kind of tyranny which seeks to rivet chains on men's minds, and delects to them their faith, they came hither, erected their altar among us, and are now presenting us with a model of practical idealization well worthy of our individual imitation.

We understand that his Excellency has appointed the 24th inst. (the Queen's birth-day), as the day on which the Germans in the colony shall be naturalized by taking the usual oath of allegiance, &c. This is a very highly praiseworthy act on the part of the Governor, and we shall rejoice to greet our German neighbours in the character—"friends not aliens."—Southern Australian, May 1.

By taking the map of the disputed territory, it will be seen, that all that part of it, on which trespasses have been committed, might have been indisputably ours, if we had accepted the award of the Dutch king, and that the small corner which would have been left to England, north of the 47th degree of latitude, and as far as Zembla, would have been very nearly compensated for by Route's Point and the strip of land, three miles wide, extending from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence, which was awarded to us, as an equivalent. If it be true, as the Maine people say—but which, by the way, I do not believe—that a million of dollars worth of furs have been stolen from these lands, while we have been quarrelling about them, and which we could have had the undisputed right to recover—please to accept the award, then, certainly Maine has been a great loser, by not accepting it long ago. It always appeared to me that the award should have been at once accepted, and I verily thought that our good people of Maine were playing a sort of Yankee trick, in pretending that they would reject the award, for fear their over-generous would prevent Great Britain from doing so. I happen to know, as the reviewer said, that our ex-governor of Maine thought it advisable to accept, with the expectation that what we should get from the general government for Route's Point, and the fort built on it, at an expense, I believe, of dollars 300,000, and from the sale of the land as arid as joining the north border of the State of New York, would be more than an equivalent for the small part of the disputed territory to be ceded to Great Britain. The difficulty was with us,—for I am a Maine man myself, but of neither party in politics, and run no risk of being mobbed when I get home, by both parties; but I must do my duty, regardless of consequences; and if the loss of one life will save my country from war, she is welcome to mine. The difficulty is, that both political parties made the boundary question a highly lucrative and powerful power, and those who talked biggest about white rights, and the glory of Maine, and her ability to engage single handed with Great Britain, got the votes, and so we have got ourselves worked up into the delirium of a war fever, and as usual in all such cases, consider moderate men as traitors and enemies to the State, and the same spirit seems to have run through the country, and that man is esteemed the greatest patriot who is most ready to involve his country in war for any cause or for no cause, and it is the same in all other countries, christian or pagan.—New York Observer.

THE LATE MR. ALDERNETHY AND SPIRITS.—The late Mr. Aldernethy was once consulted by a gentleman whose habits had greatly impaired his digestive powers. After receiving the advice of the celebrated medical man he had named, the patient said, "But, Sir, what spirits will you recommend me to drink?" Mr. Aldernethy, in disgust, replied, "Why, Sir, you may take tincture of rhubarb, that is a spirit; or you may take tincture of jalap, that is a spirit; and they have this advantage above other spirits, that you may take them into your body yourself, but they will take themselves out of your body as fast as they can."—Chist Watchman.

LAWYERS.—In a late paper, headed a "Lecture for the Lawyers," I ventured a few philosophical reflections on that intelligent and useful class of our fellow-citizens, and I took the liberty to show how one of their body would act, supposing Owen's "Moral View" to be true. Several other ideas have occurred to me upon the subject, to which, as I do not mean to be very prolix, I invite the reader's attention; nor do I deem it necessary to make any apology to the fraternity, as I know that, skilful as they are in discerning reasons on either side, they will find arguments in my favour a plenty—if they wish to do so.

The nominal purpose of a court of justice is to give the truth; but I question whether the truth is ever in other places less attacked, assailed at, brow-beaten, ridiculed, and put out of countenance. It is the truth which every man in his turn finds it his interest to conceal. It is truth that every one is afraid of. Even the party must unequivocally in the right is anxious to exclude the truth from the other side, lest it may seem to contradict his own; and all the lawyers, and even the judge, seem as much on the watch to stop the witness' mouth every ten minutes, as they have been to make him come every ten minutes. To me one of the most ridiculous things in the world is a witness upon the stand trying (poor fellow) to give in his testimony. He is, we will suppose, not in the slightest degree interested in either of the parties, and, doubtless, wishes them both tied together by the neck, and dropped off the stern of one of the north river steamboats. He comes into court, unvoluntarily, but dragged, if he resists, by two or three seeling ministers of the law, who, from the mere fact of his being presumed to know something about the pending suit, think themselves entitled to treat him as if he had been convicted of robbing a hen-roost. He is forced from his business or his amusements for the purpose of speaking the truth, and he inwardly resolves to tell the whole story as soon as possible, and get rid of the thing. He thinks he knows the worst. He thinks the less of time, and the awkwardness of speaking for the first time of his life in public, are the extent of his sufferings. Unsuspecting victim! He is sooner mouned the stand than he thinks himself as once the centre of a circle of enemies, and holding a position not greatly unlike that of a prisoner in an Indian war-dance. He tries to tell his story.

Witness. I was going down Maiden lane—

First Lawyer. Stop, Sir.

Second Lawyer. Don't interrupt the witness.

Third Lawyer. The witness is ours.

Fourth Lawyer. (Fiercely and indignantly.) We want the fact.

Judge. Let the witness tell his story.

Witness. I was going down Maiden lane, where I live—

First Lawyer. We don't want to know where you live, Sir.

Second Lawyer. That is a part of his testimony.

Third Lawyer. You can take the witness into your hands when we are done with him; at present he is ours.

Witness takes pale.

Fourth Lawyer. (Sarcastically.) Very well, Sir.

Judge. Gentlemen, I beg you will sit down.

One of the Aldermen. Officer, keep order.

Officer. (In a tone of thunder, and with a scroll of more than oriental despotism upon the spectators, who almost making any noise they know of.) Silence.

Witness. I was going down Maiden lane where I reside, and I said before, when—

First Lawyer. You don't come here to repeat what you said before, Sir.

Second Lawyer. I beg.

Third Lawyer. (Starting to his feet.) I demand.

Fourth Lawyer. I appeal to his honour the judge to protect me from the impertinence of this witness.

First, Second, Third and Fourth Lawyer, and Judge together.

"The witness must!"

Officer. (Looking at the audience again, in a voice of thunder.) Silence.

Judge. Gentlemen, it seems to me that the best way to come at the truth is to let the witness go on, and I will call him to order if he wanders from his duty. Witness!

Witness. Your honour.

Judge. Tell the plain fact of this assault—tell the jury what you know about it—remember you are to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—raise your voice—turn your face to the jury. What do you know of this affair?

The poor wretch commences again. The first, second, third, and fourth lawyers continue to skirmish around him all the while, like a parcel of wild cats fighting for the skin of some unhappy prisoner. So far from getting a chance to say the truth, the poor man can't get a chance to say any thing. At length, bewildered out of his recollection, frightened, insulted and indignant, however really desirous of telling the truth, he stumbles upon some inconsistency—some trifling or not trifling paradox—accounted for at once, and to every one's entire satisfaction, by the idea, that he has forgotten. But then comes the cross-examination. Then the scientific artillery of a cool, side lawyer, sharpened by thirty years of similar practices, is brought to bear upon the trembling and already nervous stranger; perhaps ignorant, perhaps a boy. Then comes the laugh of judge and jury, the murmur of contempt from the crowd, that a person could be found degraded and base enough to say that "the defendant wore a little rimmed hat," when he acknowledged subsequently, off his guard, that he had had a "certainly large rim." Then the poor fellow, worn all over and not quite sure that he will not himself be sent to the State's prison, at ten years' hard labour, for perjury, before the week has rolled away, although he is the only person in court who does not, in a greater or less degree, merit that punishment, is dismissed to a bench a few yards off, where he is obliged to remain to hear the lawyers, in their address to the jury, tear his character to pieces with fine turns of rhetoric, and yet draw gendulations.

"What, gentlemen of the jury," says the first lawyer, summing up in a tone of the deepest contempt, "what does the next witness, this Mr. Boggs, say? Gentlemen, he comes forward under the most peculiar circumstances. A dark mystery shrouds his motives, which I shall not endeavour to altogether dissolve. But he comes forward and takes his place upon the witness stand, with the open, the avowed, the undisguised, the unaffected, the determined resolution to fix upon my client, the injured Mr. Swipes, this foul and unnatural assault and battery. You saw him, gentlemen, when I cross-examined him, tremble under my eye; you saw him hesitate and turn pale at my voice." (The first lawyer very probably, has a voice that would intimidate a bear.) "You heard him stammer and take back his words, and say he did not recollect." Is this, gentlemen of the jury, an honest witness? The language of truth is plain and simple—it requires no previous calculation. If I ask you if you saw the sun set to-day, you answer you or no—you do not hesitate, you say the truth. You do not say, 'yes, I did,' and in the very next breath, 'no, I did not.' You do not at first tell me, 'I walked ten miles yesterday,' and afterwards say, 'yesterday I was all day ill in bed.' (Here one of the juries puts his nose by that of another, and sniffs something in approbation of this argument, and the other madd his head and looks at the speaker, as much as to say, "there is to be no use in trying to elude the sagacity of this keen-sighted lawyer. The witness had much better have told the truth.")

"Now, gentlemen, what does this witness say? He commences by telling you, gentlemen, that he lived in Maiden Lane; that he was going home on the day when this ridiculous and unnatural assault is said to have taken place; that he saw a crowd; that he approached; that he saw Mr. Swipes, my client, the defendant in this action, come up to the plaintiff, J. R. Wilkins, and give him, Wilkins, the said plaintiff, a blow with a hudgeon. But, gentlemen, when I come to sit this plausible story, you heard him equivocate and contradict himself. 'What sort of a hat had Mr. Swipes on?' A black one. 'Of what breadth was the rim?' About an inch. He thought, doubtless, he was to have every thing his own way, till I brought upon the stand, to confront him, the latter who made and sold the hat, who proves to you that the rim was broad. You cannot morally doubt that the hat worn on that day by Swipes was a broad rimmed hat; all the witnesses for the defendant swear it, and even Mr. Boggs himself, when asked questioned, acknowledged that it might have been a broad rimmed hat. Next, gentlemen, the plaintiff says: "What color were Mr. Swipes's pantaloons?" "Black," said Mr. Boggs. Gentlemen, I have produced these pantaloons in court. They have been identified beyond the possibility of a doubt. What was the result? You saw yourselves, gentlemen. The pantaloons were pepper and salt."

A cry of admiration throughout the court-room. The officer cries "order!" The poor witness unfortunately occupies a conspicuous seat, and all eyes are fixed upon him with the most virtuous indignation. He is calculating at what sacrifice he can wind up his business and go and settle in Kentucky. The lawyer waxes triumphant, and, after a withering look at Boggs, goes on:

"Furthermore, gentlemen, I asked this witness to describe the hudgeon. He could not. Had it ivory or gold on the handle? He could not tell. Was a female upon the end? Did not know. Was it heavy? Yes. Had he ever handled it? No.

(How could he tell the weight of a thing he had never handled? A dumb box of admiration.) Was he personally acquainted with Mr. Swipes? No. Had he ever seen him before? No. Since? Could he tell whether he had an aquiline nose or not? No. Was he not a friend to Mr. Wilkins? Yes. Had he not expressed an opinion upon this cause? Yes, he had said the secondly ought to have been ashamed of himself. Was Mr. Wilkins' hat knuckled off? No. But before he left the stand, he said he saw the blood on the top of the plaintiff's head. How could he see the top of the head, unless the hat had been knocked off?

Another huzz. The witness here rose and said, "Mr. Wilkins took it off to show me."

Officer. Silence, there!

Judge. Witness, you must not interrupt the counsel. You have had your turn on the stand; you then had the opportunity to say whatever you pleased. If you are again guilty of so great an indecency, I shall be obliged to commit you."

Witness stands stupid.

Officer. Sit down! (In a tone of indignant command. Witness sits down. Officer scowls at him as if he would snap his head off.)

I shall not follow the learned gentleman farther. I only appear to every witness that has ever been brought into a court of justice, whether he has not found it often the most difficult place in the world to tell the truth in, and whether, when the truth was at length told, there ever were so many attempts made to mystify it? Whether so much of what every one present knew in his heart to be the truth, could any where else be so deliberately rejected, and whether, when this poor deluded, mutilated, unhappy truth, so much demanded, was at length produced, it did not have such an aspect, as displayed that its own mother might not have known it?—N. THE MAILS OF THE BENGAL.—The patience of the long-suffering community of Calcutta, on which the Bombay Government has tried so many experiments, has fairly broken down under a new disappointment. After the intercourse with England by steam had been suspended, as usual, for three months, it was announced that, as the violence of the monsoon had subsided, the communication would be resumed, and that the first Steamer of the season would be dispatched from Bombay on the 12th September. The Post Master in Calcutta informed the public that the 27th of August would be the last safe day for the despatch of the Mails; and the "pent up" correspondence of three months, to the extent of between four and five thousand letters, was duly despatched by the appointed day. Last Saturday brought intelligence that the Berenice had sailed without our Mails, which had been detained on the road by their extraordinary weight. The injury thus inflicted on the largest commercial body in India, is intolerable; and the feelings of the community have found vent in one universal burst of indignation. A meeting is to be forthwith convened, to give expression to the general sentiment. Never have we had a more just occasion for remonstrance. It is said that extraordinary efforts were made on the Bombay side to accelerate the arrival of the Mail; and we can easily believe such a report; but this only serves to prove more clearly the incurable defects of the present system of communication, and the indispensable necessity of adopting the comprehensive scheme to prevent a constant recurrence of these disappointments. Our remedy lies in an appeal to Parliament. The Court of Directors are utterly indifferent to the grievance under which we suffer. It does not affect them. The intelligence of the occupation of Cabul, and of the termination of the campaign, reached Bombay, through Lord Auckland's despatches, in time to be sent by the Berenice. All the exclusive advantages which the Directors propose to themselves in the establishment of steamers, is secured. What matters it then if the general interests of the community in the metropolis of the empire are sacrificed? There is a cold selfishness in the policy of maintaining the present arrangements, which nothing but the interposition of Parliament, and the energy of the President of the Board of Control, can correct. Any further appeal to the Court of Directors for a system which should embrace the interests of all the Presidencies, would be only a waste of time and words. It would be in vain to tell them that the present arrangement is unjust in the highest degree; that although the different Presidencies form but one empire, yet it is a fact that while Madras just covers the charges of its government, the revenues of Bombay invariably fall short of its expenditure; and the whole expense of this steam communication is borne by the Presidency, which has been so repeatedly deprived of the benefit of it. It would be in vain to tell them that their boasted promise, put forth to still the complaints of Bengal, that the Mails should be conveyed from Bombay to Calcutta in ten days, has never been accomplished; that the Mails are eighteen, nineteen, twenty days in their transit; that with good Steamers they might be conveyed from Suez to Calcutta in less time than is now passed in crossing the country. The answer of the Directors would be plain, cold and intelligible. The Mail is a Government Mail, and exists only for the benefit of Londonhall Street. We receive our dispatches in due time; to other interests beyond our own, we never lift our eyes. We must, therefore, go up to Parliament with an energetic remonstrance. We have a strong case. We can state that the loss and injury inflicted by the present imperfect arrangement on the Presidency which bears the whole expense, is now become regular and systematic; that we require steam communication for passengers, letters and packets, to be made equally the privilege of all India, and not of a section of the empire; that the same expense which must be incurred in keeping up a monthly communication between Bombay and Suez, would be sufficient, with a little addition, to keep up a communication which should embrace not only Bombay, but Bengal, Madras and Ceylon; and that the additional charge would be fully compensated by the increase of postage and passage money. We can assert that the Steamers cannot stem the monsoon from Bombay during three or four months in the year; that an experiment has been made of sending a sailing vessel with the Mails from Calcutta to Aden in the height of the monsoon; and that she performed the voyage in thirty-six days; while a vessel from Bombay sent about the same time to the same port, was forty-one days in making the voyage, though the distance is not more than a third; and that it is physically certain that Steamers would make their way with speed from Calcutta to the Red Sea at all seasons of the year. Our petition may succeed; it may fail; but in this case we shall have the satisfactory reflection of having done all in our power to obtain the comprehensive scheme.

The inconvenience which we suffer from the detention of papers in crossing the country may be a matter of amusement to our contemporaries at Bombay; but we can assure them that it is so great as to justify much more severe language than we choose to adopt. Our own newspapers, which were landed at Bombay on the 6th September, reached Calcutta on the 1st of October; that is to say in TWENTY-FIVE DAYS. The last intelligence from England states, that under the new arrangements, letters will be only THIRTY-FIVE DAYS in travelling from London to Bombay. Is it to be borne that after this they should be TWENTY-FIVE DAYS in reaching Calcutta?

POWER OF THE SUPREME GOVERNMENT TO VARY ACTS OF PARLIAMENT PASSED BEFORE THE CHARTER.—This subject has been brought under the consideration of the Indian community, by various Acts of the Legislative Council, and has been urged on public notice by those who consider the Council to have exceeded its powers on several occasions. It is a subject of large importance, and is worthy of more dispassionate examination than it has yet received. We shall, therefore, offer no apology for bringing it prominently before our readers, and stating the reasons which lead us to conclude, that the modifications which have been made of the statute law of England, by the Legislative Council, are not repugnant to the wishes of Parliament. The great question upon which the controversy turns, is simply this: When Parliament thought it advisable to establish, for the first time, a Local Legislature in India, with powers which had never been granted to the Governor General in Council before; was it, or was it not the intention of that body to vest this Local Legislature with power to vary and alter Acts of Parliament, to suit the peculiar circumstances of the country?

We conceive that when Parliament on this occasion thought fit to place certain statutes and laws beyond the reach of the newly-created Legislative Council, it was to be considered to have placed all others within its reach; and that the only object proposed by Parliament in adopting the use of the word "saving," was to allow the Local Legislature a power to modify all that was not included in the saving clause. The words of that clause are these:

"Save and except that the said Governor General in Council shall not have the power of making any laws or regulations which shall in any way repeal, vary, suspend or affect any of the provisions of this Act, or any of the provisions of the Acts for Punishing Mutiny and Disobedience of Officers, &c., or any provisions of any Act heretofore in being, in any wise affecting the said Company, or the said territories, or the inhabitants thereof, or any laws or regulations which shall in any way affect any Prerogative of the Crown, or the Authority of Parliament, or the Constitution or Rights of the said Company, or any part of the unwritten laws or constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, wherein may depend in any degree the allegiance of any person in the Crown of the United Kingdom, or the Sovereignty or Dominion of the said Crown over any part of the said Territories."

It has been contended that the words, Authority of Parliament in this clause, must be taken to signify that it is not within the province of the Legislative Council to repeal, vary, suspend or affect any Act of Parliament whatever; but were this interpretation admitted, it would fix on Parliament the absurdity of a most glaring tautology. It would make the Legislature say—You, the Governor General, shall not vary this Act of ours; nor the Act for the Punishment of Mutiny; nor any Act which we may hereafter pass for the government of India; nor any Act of Parliament whatsoever: which would be a ridiculous enactment, unworthy of the wisdom of Parliament. The presumption arising from the fact, that some Acts passed before the Charter were specifically saved, is, therefore, that the Acts over which Parliament has not cast its broad shield, are consigned to the wisdom of the Local Legislature to be varied, repealed or suspended, as may appear necessary.

It must also be remembered, that the Governor General in Council, before the passing of this Act, had no right whatever to vary, repeal or suspend an Act of Parliament; and that if it had been the intention of the Home Legislature to confer so new powers on the Indian Legislature in the New Charter, but to leave it in the same weak and humble position in which it stood before the passing of the Act, the most plain and common sense mode of procedure would have been to have preserved the same total silence regarding the authority of the Governor General in Council over Acts of Parliament, which was observed in preceding Charters; and the only motive which can be supposed to have led to the enumeration of certain Acts which were not to be touched, was, that Acts not enumerated were open to repeal and modification by the Local Legislature.

It is, moreover, difficult to account for the peculiar phraseology by which any Act hereafter passed is exempted from the control of the Indian Legislature, except on the supposition that previous Acts were not intended to be placed in the same category. The words, Authority of Parliament, in their natural signification, are very different from Acts of Parliament which are to be known from their companions, according to the established rule of construction, as well in this instance, as in cases of ordinary life. We find in this Charter Act, that the subject of Acts of Parliament is first dealt with, and dismissed, and then the clause proceeds to the subjects of Prerogative, Authority of Parliament, Constitution of the Company, Allegiance and Sovereignty.

So much for the technical construction of words and sentences. But may it not be further asked, could the Legislature be supposed to have acted with such inconsistency, as to have surrendered nearly the whole of the Common Law, by far the most extensive and most important of the laws of England, and to have temerously reserved every statutory provision since the time of legal memory? Of those statutes; of the complicated and superannuated statutes of the Law of England, we have seen that Parliamentary Commissions have been employed, year after year, under Tory, as well as under Whig administrations, in brushing away, scrap upon scrap; and in making some small progress in the great design of reducing our laws to a consistency with the principles of common sense and equity. It is difficult to suppose, that Parliament should consider its authority impugned, if the Local Legislature performed a similar kind of office for India, and undertook duties which the Home Legislature had not leisure to execute? Must our Criminal Code remain a Code of blood; our conveyances be rendered more intricate and expensive than those of England, and our commerce be shackled by the restrictions of a barbarous age, until the English Legislature repeals for India, what since the Charter it has repealed for England only? To us, indeed, it appears plain, that it was the distinct intention of Parliament,—which never willingly listens to Indian subjects,—to constitute a Local Legislature, and to invest it with authority to vary, modify, repeal or suspend those antecedent Acts of Parliament which were not specially exempted from its jurisdiction in the New Charter.

It seems difficult upon any other supposition to account for the concurrence of all the Home Authorities in the proceedings of the Legislative Council, by which Acts of Parliament have been repealed or modified. It seems still more difficult to account for the apathy of Parliament itself on the subject. In the case of the Act, facetiously called Black, a clause in an English statute was distinctly repealed. The community of Calcutta appealed to Parliament on that occasion, and sent home the first man of the Bar to sustain the appeal. The question was brought before Parliament; it was distinctly stated that the Indian Legislature had repealed a part of the statute law of England; but the case excited no indignation; it was virtually consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. If it had not been the intention of Parliament to confer on the Local Legislature the power which it had exercised: surely the occasion would not have been allowed to pass without an Act, declaratory of the original design of Parliament, and limiting the authority of the Legislative Council. Is it illogical, therefore, to infer, that the power which has been exercised in this country by the Governor General in Council, is considered to be in strict accordance with the intentions of the Home Legislature, and that it has received the distinct approbation of Parliament on the only occasion on which the subject was brought under the notice of the House?

MANUAL OF MEDICINE FOR THE NATIVES.—A Gentleman in the Upper Provinces, who takes a lively interest in Native education, suggests that a simple family medicine book in Oordoo would be a very popular and useful addition to the class books already in use. He would have it contain a couple of plates of the human skeleton and frame, a general description of the several parts of the body and their uses, the particular diseases to which they are commonly liable, with their symptoms, and the best simple bazar remedies and their way of being used. He would have a chapter also on general health, and the means of its preservation; and a table of diseases and prescriptions, including as many good Native recipes as possible—the whole being as written as to be intelligible to common respectable Natives, who would thus get some notion of their own structure, and what is necessary to keep it in repair. "In this district," says our Correspondent, "the best Hukoom (physician) is one of my Thannadars: people who cannot get to him, content themselves with taking whatever the ignorant people near them may recommend."

The suggestion is exceedingly good; and from what we hear, there seems to be a probability that the wish of our Correspondent will be gratified before long. A Manual is to be prepared, we believe, for the Native Medical School connected with the Medical College in Calcutta, and no time will be lost in putting it into the principal Native languages. When such a work is in contemplation, it would seem presumptuous for any other party to undertake one of similar character. At the same time we cannot but think, that much good might be done, by the extensive circulation of a much more simple tract than that suggested by our Correspondent. Dispensing with all anatomy and physiology, it should merely describe the most prevalent diseases of the country, as the most common forms of fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, spleen, and cholera, with the remedies most easily to be had. We have a most intense dislike of all books of "Domestic Medicine," and although we have the best of them, they stand upon our shelves unopened from year's end to year's end. But had we not medical advice at hand, the case would be different. We should then make friends with Thomas, Cooper and Graham very gladly. Now the poor people of India have no medical advice, but great plenty of sickness; and very many lives might be saved by a few easy instructions—certainly more than enough to compensate for the occasional mischief done by misapplying the prescriptions of the book. We wish, therefore, some benevolent physician of experience would condescend to become the poor man's doctor, and put as much as possible of the healing art into a tract of four and twenty pages.

PETITION FOR THE EQUALIZATION OF DUTIES.—We have placed among our selections, the Petition to the British Parliament, for an equalization of duties on Indian produce, brought forward by Mr. Martin, in the Court of Proprietors, and which the Directors propose to adopt with some modifications. We are happy to perceive that the Directors are anxious to repel the charge of indifference to the commercial welfare of India, which it appears Mr. Martin had endeavoured to fix on them. It is, however, a matter of historical record, that of all bodies, the Court of Directors have hitherto appeared to be the least anxious to remove existing impediments to the trade and agricultural prosperity of India. Almost every amelioration in the commercial relations of this country may be traced to the unaided importunity and zeal of other classes of society. The vast influence of the East India Corporation has never been adequately employed for the benefit of this distant empire. Down to the period of the last Charter, the idea still lingered in Leadenhall Street, that Europeans in India were no better than interlopers; and every measure brought by them under the notice of Parliament, however beneficial, was regarded with a jaundiced eye, and refused that co-operation which India had reason to expect from its constituted guardians. It is gratifying to observe that the Directors have turned over a new leaf; and have, with the relinquishment of their exclusive privileges, abjured those narrow jealousies which grew out of them; and that they are prepared to make common cause with India for Parliamentary relief from the burdens which still shackle its industry.

Much as has been done for India of late years, much remains to be done, before it can be said to enjoy the same common chance of improvement with other colonies and other nations. The manufactures of England are forced on it by low duties; its manufactures and agricultural industry are repressed by those heavy and unequal duties, which are laid on its productions on their importation into England. In this respect it has been treated with more severity and injustice than foreign nations in alliance with England. Had any foreign country agreed to receive English manufactures at the same favourable rate of duty at which they are imported into India, England would never have imposed such heavy duties on the reception of its produce. To India alone is denied all participation in the benefit of the reciprocity system. Not only, however, has India been regarded as a colony and not as a nation, but has been less favoured than the other colonies of Great Britain. This injustice requires to be redressed.

In many other respects has India been treated with a severity ill calculated to promote the growth of any attachment to the country which rules it. Millions are annually sent home, as one of the Directors very justly observed, for which there is at present no return; and for which no compensation can be made, except by the admission of our produce into England on the most favourable terms. This ought to be regarded rather as a question of justice, than one of fiscal regulation, considering that India sends in direct contribution to England two millions and a half sterling a year. Since the New Charter Act, India has been required to indemnify the Proprietors of India Stock for the loss of their China trade, by the payment, in annual instalments, of thirteen millions sterling. Of this arrangement, the whole benefit accrues to England, while the whole charge falls on India. Since the passing of the previous Charter in 1813, British manufactures have been introduced into this country to the extent, in one article alone, of nearly a million and a half sterling; and the Indian manufacturers have been driven out of the home and foreign markets. A change has thus been made unfavourable to the interests of the Indian manufacturers, to the extent of two millions and a half sterling a year. This is to be attributed, it is true, to the unrivalled skill and ingenuity of English manufacturers; and under the strict rules of political economy ought not, perhaps, to be ranked among injuries; yet it is impossible for those who reside in the country not to deplore the poverty and desolation which it has spread among a very numerous class of its industrious inhabitants. Manchester has impoverished and depopulated Dacca. We do not ask for prohibitory duties on English cottons; but India has, at least, a right to expect that its produce shall be received on the footing of the most favoured nations and colonies.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF BOMBAY: VOL. II.—We beg to return our thanks for the courtesy to which we are indebted, for the possession of this volume. The members of the medical profession in the Bombay Presidency appear to be duly sensible of their obligation, to contribute the results of their observation and practice to the world, and are fulfilling their duty in a manner highly creditable to themselves. It has always appeared to us that there was no profession besides, the members of which were so generally imbued with a generous spirit. The extent of their gratuitous attendance upon the poor, their frequent liberality in supplying both medicines and comforts to necessitous patients, and their ready sacrifice of rest and comfort at every call of suffering humanity, have endeared them to all ranks of modern society. But there is another sense in which the profession appears to be peculiarly generous in its character. There is a frankness of spirit in their professional writings exceedingly remarkable. They chronicle with equal minuteness their successful and their unsuccess-cessful practice; appearing justly to consider, that to prevent recurrence to worthless remedies, even by the exposure of their own failures, is scarcely less useful than to establish new and more effective means of cure. Were their papers to be read only by the profession, their disregard of personal considerations would be less remarkable; for in that case they would have reason to confide in the knowledge and experience of their readers, for a candid construction of their proceedings. But now-a-days what is written for the profession, goes abroad into the world, and finds readers of many sorts. The medical profession, therefore, in adopting the course they now universally pursue, seem to say, more emphatically than words could express it, that they disclaim professional secrets and nostrums, and found their medical practice upon scientific fact, patiently ascertained by laborious and intelligent observation; and whilst they are honestly pursuing their researches, and following, as they best can, the high vocation of doing good, it matters little to them what judgement may be passed upon their conduct. The generous character of the medical profession is intellectual as well as moral. Their science is not a narrow professional thing. Anatomy and physiology are, indeed, its great foundations. But in order that they may be laid safely, and built upon with accuracy, the modern physician requires a universal education. Hence medical men, without number, are found to turn aside from their own peculiar walk, become the most successful cultivators of every department of natural science, and again bring back to their professional studies and labours the most important contributions. With the higher branches of pure mathematics, physicians have seldom interfered; but none have furnished us more richly with beautiful illustrations of natural mechanics, or made better use of mechanical resources. In the philosophy of mind, we are indebted to the medical profession for many of our best and soundest writers. Indeed, considering the intimate connection between mind and physical organization, both in the healthy and disordered state, there is no person has such opportunity of observing and appreciating mental phenomena as the physician. In zoology, botany, geology and mineralogy, and meteorology, nearly all our great names belong to the medical profession. In fact they are the most industrious and efficient labourers in the wide field of natural science, and are so by a sort of necessary extension of their mere professional studies. Even the new Sedices of Political Economy and Statistics (if they can be separated) can make no satisfactory progress without them.*

The liberal character of medical science is very apparent in the papers which compose the volume before us. Their great theme is, of course, the description and treatment of disease—but of disease under local peculiarities. Hence they are largely interspersed with information of general interest. The first paper in the volume is a Report by Assistant Surgeon F. Forbes, of the Diseases at Palce; which the author considers identical with the plague of Egypt and the Levant, and with the Kuteh and Kattivar epidemics of 1817-20, and Marwar in 1836-7. He also concludes that it has at intervals prevailed epidemically throughout Marwar, from a very remote period, and is as likely to be indigenous there as in Egypt. We have been particularly interested by a Report on the Mubabulshwur, Convalescent Station for 1837-8, from J. Murray, Esq., the resident Surgeon. This Sanatorium stands on the Western Ghats, 4,500 feet above the level of the sea: and from 1st Oct. 1837 to 30th Sept. 1838, its mean temperature was 66. 20, the average minimum temperature 61. 37, the extreme minimum 48. 6; and the fall of rain for the year 180. 17 inches, which nearly all fell in November, June, July, August and September. The number of rainy days was 132. The present Report is the second that Mr. Murray has made, and is the more valuable, as containing the result of prolonged observation. It is at once favourable and discriminating. Whether a resort to the Sanatorium be of any value or not, it is evidently increasing greatly in popular estimation. The number of visitors is increasing every year: in 1836-37, they amounted to 232, and in 1837-38 to 313. But it is the object of the Report to establish the character of the Sanatorium upon a surer foundation than popular opinion. The author observes that the investigation of the influence of climate on disease, is one of peculiar difficulty, and beset with numerous sources of uncertainty and error, and our Indian hill-climates have one element of great importance to which he thinks too little attention has been paid: it is the stimulus created by diminished atmospheric pressure on the vascular system. It is the presence of this element, he thinks, in the constitution of inter-tropical mountain-climates, which emphatically distinguishes them from, and will ever render them inferior in therapeutic efficacy, to isothermal climates, whose temperature is the effect of latitude. The combination of this stimulus, with the tonic operation of reduced temperature, has unquestionably a beneficial effect, in various forms of non-organic disease; but at the same time, Mr. Murray is convinced, that it is this stimulus which renders the Indian hill-climates inapplicable, if not positively injurious, in inflammatory or organic visceral diseases. His Report is chiefly a review of the principal cases of disease, that the visitors at the Sanatorium presented. They appear fairly to support his general views, and particularly establish the great value of the hill-climate, in invigorating constitutions that have been simply debilitated by the heat of the plains, in warding off many of the acute diseases incident to childhood, and supporting the energies of the constitution during the first years of children's growth, and so lessening their liability to future disease.

The volume before us contains several Hospital Reports of much value, and as many as forty-five cases illustrative of the pathology of the diseases of Bombay, by C. Murdoch, Esq., M. D.; but these are matters not exactly within our cognizance. We could notice with greater satisfaction the papers on the Topography of Ahmednugur, Mr. Gibson's Remarks on the vegetation, people and diseases of the Deccan, and the paper on the climate of Sattara: but this our limits prevent.

It is stated in the Appendix, that, at the request of Government, a Committee of the Medical and Physical Society of Bombay had presented a Report on the Medical Education of the Natives of the Bombay Presidency; but whether any practical good has resulted from it is unknown. The Committee collected much valuable information; but their Report has not been printed. The success of the Calcutta Medical College ought certainly to lead to the establishment of a similar institution at Bombay. The need is there as great as in Bengal; and it would be absurd to suppose that the inhabitants of Bombay could avail themselves of the Calcutta College. We hope yet to hear, that the Government of Bombay has been authorized to provide medical instruction for its people. Were the Medical Society to publish, at least a selection from the documents in their hands, we should think the object would be likely to receive more favourable attention.

EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVES IN THE REFORM OF THE MAGISTRACY.—Two Correspondents of the Commercial Advertiser have come forward to upbraid us with having advocated the employment of European, rather than Native agency, in the reformation of the Police. They both build their argument upon the assumption, that we are unfriendly to the employment of Natives in public situations of responsibility, than which nothing can be more unfounded. It does not follow, that because one branch of the public service appears to require qualifications, which are to be found in a higher degree among Europeans, than among Natives, any one who advises the preference of European functionaries in this particular department, is to be considered an enemy to the employment of Natives generally. It does not follow that because Sir John Keane sent European troops to storm the citadel of Ghizul, he is, therefore, anxious to dispense with the services of our brave Native army. There are situations in which the brighter peculiarities of the Native character may be employed to the great benefit of the public interests. There are others in which the objectionable propensities of the Natives, would be found an obstacle to the prosecution of public measures. In the former, we include the department of civil jurisprudence, in which Native shrewdness, penetration and industry, is most beneficially employed in promoting the ends of justice. In the latter case, we refer chiefly to the department of the Police, which holds out temptations, so difficult to be resisted, of putting in practice the ancient and inveterate habit of turning power into money. In the former case, whatever errors may be committed by the Native Judge, may be corrected by appeal to a higher Court. In the latter, the injury is irreparable. When the Native finds himself oppressed by an officer of the Police, he rarely complains, lest greater evils should befall him. His only remedy is carefully to conceal in future all cases of robbery and murder, of which the publication might bring down the Darogah upon the village with his endless train of extortions. The consequence is, that robbers are emboldened by the conviction that their victims are quite as anxious as themselves to conceal crimes; and the country is desolated. While, therefore, we advocate the employment of subordinate Native Police Officers on salaries which shall remove the necessity of extortion, we still cling to the notion, that the superintendence of the reform which is so much desired, should be committed, for the present, to Europeans; that is, we would place a European Magistrate in every case within reach of the complaints of the Natives; this, and this alone, can give them that confidence which will induce them to aid, instead of thwarting, the Police of the country.

Our Native friends must not forget that strict official integrity, in the sense in which the British Government understands the term, has never been deemed necessary in this country, under any former administration. It is, therefore, a virtue of modern introduction. Whether it existed under the Hindoo economy, we have not historical data sufficient to decide. Judging from the character of Hindoo legislation, we should think it did not. During the six centuries in which the Mahomedans held India, the universal law of the East, that of leaving every man in office to pay himself out of his situation, was in full operation. The same rule is in force to this day in Burmah, Siam, Cochin China and China. It is impossible that this long continued habit should not have begotten an idea, that the exactions of power are, in themselves, legitimate; and this idea, so pleasing in itself, is likely to be cherished and acted on, even after the necessity of illegal gain has been removed, by the gift of suitable salaries. That the British Government has not, as yet, established a scale of allowances sufficiently liberal to warrant its expecting that Native Officers will lay aside the habit of abusing their power, we fully admit; and we trust that every year will witness an improvement of liberality. But the habit has been so long domesticated, that many years of just and equitable administration must elapse, before it is eradicated; or before the bulk of the people can be brought to believe that their own best paid countrymen are impervious to a bribe. It is on this account chiefly that we are anxious to see the reform of the Police entrusted to European energy and integrity, in which the Natives have so much more confidence.

We are fully aware, that habits of official integrity are of recent growth in our native land. The Justices of the Peace in England, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, were as oppressive and venal as the Darogahs of Bengal; and they were paid with equal parsimony. But in the lapse of time, by the gradual ascendancy of the principles of justice; by the influence of a more elevating faith, the seat of power, supreme and subordinate, has been purified. We have little doubt that the same happy results will gradually follow the adoption of a wise, liberal, and vigilant system of Government in this country.

We entreat our Native friends not to imagine, that because we prefer European to Native agency, in the present emergency, when firmness and incorruptible integrity can alone save the country from the desolation of general pillage, that we shall cease to advocate the elevation of Natives to high situations in their own country. We believe there can be no error in government more fatal, than that of excluding Natives of the soil from all hope of distinction and wealth in the discharge of public duties. Every new office that is thrown open to the competition of Native talent, forms a new political tie, and becomes a new stimulus to national regeneration. Our advice in regard to the Natives of India would be, Educate them well; trust them well; pay them well; watch them well; and we shall, in the end, have no reason to complain of Native functionaries.

MALDA.—We are happy to hear of a revival of the spirit of benevolence at Malda. Perhaps no place in Bengal participated so early in the benefits bestowed by British piety. When Carey and Thomas, in the commencement of their Mission, in 1794, took charge of Indigo factories in the neighbouring district of Dinagore, they found a little group of Christian friends in Malda, (then, as a Commercial Residency, of much greater importance than it is now) amongst whom they conducted divine worship every alternate Sabbath. The Grants, Udry's, Crightons and Ellertons of those days were never men to be forgotten in retracing the introduction of the gospel into this country. They not only strengthened the hands of the Missionaries, but partook of their labours in establishing schools, and communicating the word of God to the Natives. Their example found imitators in Malda for a long series of years; and now, we trust, it will be again revived. There is a wealthy Mulajun, it seems, in the town, who maintains an old man as a schoolmaster; and, through the zeal of the Magistrate, another teacher is to be added, and a supply of school books obtained, in the hope that the school may be enlarged and made fully effective. As soon as that object is gained, and the people appear to be sufficiently interested in the education of their children, it is intended that an English school shall be opened. As an accompaniment to this good work, the Acting Surgeon of the Station has determined to open an Hospital, for all who choose to have recourse to it. Both these undertakings will prove rather costly; but we trust they will obtain support from all the wealthy people in the district; and, though we have no authority for saying so, we imagine that any donations sent to the Magistrate for either object would be seasonable and acceptable. We shall be happy to hear of the successful progress made by our friends.

KURNOUL AND THE COMPANY'S GOVERNMENT.—Having received an accession of Native subscribers within the last month, we cannot, perhaps, testify our gratitude more effectually, than by endeavouring to disabuse them of the notion which some of their English friends would fain instil into their minds, regarding the Government and the institutions under which they live. One of their friends publicly declared some time back, that the British Government was infinitely worse than the despotism of the Mahomedans. We seize the opportunity afforded by the recent events at Kurnoul, to put this assertion to the test of facts. Kurnoul is an independent Mahomedan principality in the south of India, connected by ties and treaties with the paramount power of the empire. What were the causes which constrained the British Government to determine on dispatching a military force into this territory, we have yet to learn; we simply know that a respectable body of troops is about to march thither. The Nabob is the last remaining Patian Prince in Southern India, described by those who know him, as prodigal, headstrong, ignorant and tyrannical; much given to cock-fighting and strong waters, and leaving public affairs to his Dewan, Nundar Khan. On the 13th of August, the whole of his horsemen, who were ten months in arrears, came forward, and the fort gates being shut, plumed themselves on the outside of the gate, and declared they would not move till they got their money. The Rohillas next day followed their example, but no one dared to inform the Nabob of these movements. On the 17th, his Minister declared that the troops were very mutinous, on which the Nabob fell into a rage, and ordered their arrears to be discharged. On the 18th, he made the same report regarding the horsemen, and the Nabob ordered them to be beaten away. Their chief officer, on hearing this, said, Very good, but we will not stir till we have got our money. The Nabob was obliged to yield, and gave them an order on the Talooks; that is, directed them to collect the rents from the land themselves. On the 21st, the town duties were less than 300 Rupees, which was the minimum fixed by the Nabob, and he ordered the Cutwal to receive personal chastisement, and the next day levied a contribution from all the petty dealers, according to their means.

Contrast the conduct of the British Government in withholding the town duties, with that of the Mahomedan Prince, ordering the city officers to be whipt, because the duties fell short a single day, and levying fresh and arbitrary contributions on the inhabitants. Let the individual who so patriotically described the British Government, and any Natives who may have credited him, picture to themselves the scenes which would inevitably occur, if Calcutta, with its immense wealth, were placed for one twelvemonth under the uncontrolled dominion of a Mahomedan power. They would then find to their cost, that a Mahomedan Government is like rotten wood, on which, according to the Chinese aphorism, nothing good or useful can be carved. The British Government, under which Bengal has now flourished for more than eighty years, is, like all other governments, susceptible of improvement; and from the constant changes for the better which have been made during the last ten years, we should think that no men are more convinced of this fact, than the members of Government themselves. Our administration in this country is more equitable, more discriminative, and far more national, than it was fifty years ago. It is becoming daily more and more accommodated to the wants of the Natives; and except, perhaps, in the matter of resurrections, we think it may be affirmed, that there has not been a single measure of Government during the last quarter of a century, in the contemplation of which the Natives have not had reason to congratulate themselves that there was so little chance of the substitution of a Mahomedan for a British administration.

LOSS OF RECORDS.—Little has been heard of the losses sustained by the late gale. One of the most serious disasters, we believe, was the entire destruction of the fleet of the Commissioner of Police. Pinnaces, hulkbarges, and country-boats, (with the exception of one small cook-boat quickly drawn up on shore,) were all dashed to pieces in little more than a quarter of an hour, at Baulrah. Happily the catastrophe occurred in the middle of the day, and no lives were lost. Much property, however, was destroyed, and all the office records, except a portion which one of the clerks had in use in his boat, and took care to bring on shore. What may be the value of such records, and whether they can be replaced from other sources, we cannot tell: but it does seem strange, that all the records of an office should be carried about the country, exposed to the well known risks of our river navigation, in the rainy season.

THE ALIF LAILA.—We have been favoured by Messrs. Thacker and Co., with a copy of the Second Volume of the "Alif Laila, or Arabian Night's Entertainment," printed in the original Arabic from the authentic copy of the work discovered by the late Major Macan, in Egypt. This spirited undertaking will, we trust, continue to experience the patronage of the public, in an unabated degree, that the publishers may be enabled to complete a work so precious to every lover of Oriental Literature.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26.

The second instalment of the Overland Mail came in yesterday evening, and we now learn that the delay in its arrival at Jeddah, arose from the detention, on the voyage, of the sailing vessel, the Orizoa, by which it was sent on. The astounding intelligence is received by this opportunity, that the Captain Pasha, the Admiral of the Turkish fleet, by an act of unparalleled treachery, had delivered up the whole of the vessels under his charge, twenty-five in number, (two or three that sailed away excepted,) to Mahomed Ali; and that the Egyptian ruler had declared that he would never restore it, except the Sultan would concede to its terms, and grant him the hereditary independent sovereignty of Egypt, Syria and Arabia!! Seldom has such fortune attended the footsteps of our man. Between the 25th of June and 15th of July, Mahomed Ali has defeated, if not annihilated, the Turkish army, and obtained possession of the whole of the Turkish fleet. The Turkish empire is at his feet, and but for the interposition of the European powers, a new dynasty would ascend the throne of Constantinople.—The Helen, one of the best of the vessels employed in the China trade, is to take her departure with passengers for Aden, on the 15th of next month; the first of the vessels of the season; for we expect that an increasing number will be laid on the Red Sea line this year.—Mr. Macauley remains another twelvemonth at Calcutta. Mrs. Macauley still pressed immediately to join him; and will be accompanied by nearly all the ladies of the officers belonging to the Regiments which remain there. Races are already announced. Who could have predicted two years ago, that in the summer of 1840, Calcutta would be the scene of English galloping?—It is said that Mr. B. N. C. Hamilton will be selected as Governor of the North West Provinces. The appointment is, we believe, entirely in the gift of the Governor General, and may be legally bestowed on any Esquire or Advocate Surgeon who has served the Company faithfully for ten years; but it has hitherto been usual to make the selection from the members of Council, who have naturally a priority of claim.—Mr. Greenway throws no additional light on the three of Rupees of treasure trove at Bhurpore, which is to send so many Majors and Colonels home, and to give an unexpected impulse to promotion. The intelligence came, it seems, from a Correspondent.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27.

The Plantagenet is in from England, the 25th June, after an extraordinary passage of three months, and a day or two over. She brings a large accession of Missionary strength, Roman Catholic, Episcopalian and Baptist.—Sir John Keane's Recollections of the storm of Ghazal, have begun to be published in General Orders. Four days after the event, His Excellency remembers that he had forgotten how that Major Traill commanded H. M. 18th on that occasion; and in a Supplementary Order, publicly acknowledges the Major's services at the head of his Regiment.—A very singular case has been decided in the Court of Requests, in which it is difficult to discover whether the wisdom of the Bench, or the honesty of Ditch Reporters, is most to be admired. It appears that Mr. F. Palmer was compelled, through unfortunates, to take the benefit of the Insolvent Act. He requested Mr. R. F. Smith and Mr. Grogg, who are practitioners in the latter Court, and also reporters, not to report his case, as it would do him a serious injury; and he offered to give them twenty Rupees in cash money. They agreed to his terms, and held their peace. Mr. Smith now sues Mr. Palmer for the amount, and it was decreed.—The Madras papers have it, that Mr. E. F. Elliott, the absent Chief Magistrate of Madras, is reported to have come on to Calcutta, to introduce the same reform into the Police of these provinces, which has been so successful in introducing into Madras. Our contemporaries are out in their calculation; for if general and uncontradicted report be correct, Mr. Dampier succeeds to the charge of the Police, on the retirement of Mr. F. C. Smith.—The Madagascar Steamer, we learn, has not yet been dispatched of at the Isle of France; but it seems more than probable that the Bengal Government will have her.—Letters have been received from the Mauritius. The political complexion of that Island have taken the Bakers in hand; and it is proposed to place them under the surveillance of the Police. No one is to sail broad without special permission from the Chief Commissary; no permission is to be given, except to Bakers of acknowledged morality; and no bread is to be sold at a higher rate than that fixed by Proclamation. Why not adopt the more simple plan pursued at Constantinople; where, when the Bakers are refractory, the Sultan takes off the heads of two or three ass sticks fixed on the gates of the palace; and the price of bread instantly falls?—This seems to be the year of short passages; the Jeune Lucie is just in from the Cape in thirty nine days.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28.

The young Rajah, Kunwar Kishan Roy, who will come of age in three or four months, proceeded a day or two ago, apparently in consequence of some dispute with his mother, to the family mansion with Mr. Strettel, the Attorney, Mr. McCann, of the Police, and several others; and having first warned the females out of the room, proceeded to cord and seal up sundry chests which were then conveyed to the house of his guardian, Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland. The chests were said to contain thirty lakhs of Rupees. The case has been brought before the Police, where several barriers appeared for the parties. A great desire exists to bring the affair into the Supreme Court, where there has not been so fat a case for many a long year.—The thirteen crates of Rupees said to have been discovered at Bhurpore is now said to have found his way to Joudhpore.—Further intelligence has been received from Egypt, as the instalments of the last Mail drop in. It is now affirmed that the Turkish fleet was not given up to Mahomed Ali by act of treachery, but was sent to Alexandria, with the full consent of the new Sultan, there to be kept in safety from the grasp of Russia. The only fact we can, therefore, glean on this subject from the Mail, is, that the Turkish fleet is in the hands of Mahomed Ali, but under what arrangement we cannot tell.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 30.

The Rajah of Sattara has been dethroned by orders of Sir James Rivett Carnac, for plotting, as it is said, against the British Government; and his brother has been raised to the vacant seat. In this deposition, and that of Dost Mahomed, which has been already communicated, two other Rajas are, it is supposed, to come to reign before the close of this year, the Rajah of Joudhpore and the Nabob of Kurum.—The Bombay Mail of the 14th of September has arrived; those of the 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th and 13th are still missing.—Intelligence has been received that the Ureca left Bombay for England without the Calcutta Mails. The indignation which is felt by all classes of the community, is intense; but does not exceed the provocation. There is every reason to suppose that the packets which left Calcutta on the 20th and 21st will also be too late for the next Mail.—Letters from Nagpore state, that the letters of the Overland Mail which reached Bombay on the 6th, did not reach Nagpore till the morning of the 17th, eleven days between Bombay and the half way house at Nagpore, though the Directors promised India that the Mails should reach Calcutta in eight days.—The Berenice left Bombay with 14,176 covers. Had the Calcutta Mail been received, the number of letters and papers would have been close upon twenty thousand. This is the largest number of covers ever despatched from India to England in a single month.—Mr. Tassin has just laid the community under a fresh obligation, by the publication of a map of the Tea country of Upper Assam. The map is on a large scale, and is executed with the utmost neatness.—The Bombay papers state, that the sum drawn from India by the Court of Directors, between the 1st of May, 1838, and the 30th April, 1839, amounted to 2,344,000*l*. The Delhi Gazette contains an account of a half effaced epiphany which has been discovered at Calcut, over the tomb of some European, who was buried there in 1668.—Mr. Robertson, the Deputy Governor of Calcutta, left town on Saturday, on account of his health, to cruise for eight or ten days in H. M. Ship Canary.—Notwithstanding the gloomy accounts of the Opium market, the Lady Grant has left Bombay for Canton with 356 chests on board, belonging to Native speculators.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 1.

This is the auspicious day in which the New Post Office Regulations, one of the greatest boons ever conferred on India, comes into operation. Its importance may be judged of from the following notice of the reduction it will effect, which we have taken from the Englishman.

The funeral obsequies of the mother of Asudh Deb, one of the most wealthy Natives in Calcutta, has just been celebrated with extraordinary pomp; but, happily, without the usual assemblage of paupers.—The Bombay Mail of the 14th has arrived, but those of the 9th and 10th, and intervening days, are yet absent.—The disappointment which has been experienced by the departure of the Berenice, without the Calcutta Mails, will, we learn, be shared by Government, which is only as it should be. All the despatches regarding the present state of affairs with the Burmese and Nepauls, which the young civilians in Calcutta were appointed to copy, that their contents might not get wind, were in the packets which arrived too late. For once the Directors will suffer from their own narrow policy.—The Church built for the Rev. Krishna Mohun Banerjee, in Cornwallis Square, was consecrated by the Bishop last week. It is called Christ Church. The Native preacher, for whom it is intended, preached his first sermon there on Sunday last, the 29th September.—The Harbours of this morning renew the report, that twelve new regiments are to be raised immediately, six at the Deval Presidency, four at Bombay, and two at Madras.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

CONVERSION OF CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

The little church, which has been built in Cornwallis Square, for the use of native converts to, and enquires after, Christianity, was consecrated yesterday morning by the Lord Bishop and his clergy, in presence of a crowded congregation of all classes of society, but principally of Hindoos. Every seat was occupied, and numbers of people were standing in the aisles, as well as at the doors and windows.

The church is in the Gothic style, with painted windows, and has a row of shuted columns on each side. The east window is of neat stained glass, and the several doors are also similarly ornamented. The altar, pulpit, reading desk, and the accommodations for the congregation, are all of teak, plain, but very neat. About one-half of the church is partitioned off into pews, containing not chairs as is usual in this country, but long cane-bottomed seats. The remainder of the church is unenclosed, and furnished with seats similar to those in the pews.

The regular morning service was then read by the Rev. Kistomohun Bonnerjee. Interspersed with the usual prayers, were several, appropriate to the occasion, which were read by the Bishop himself.

After the service, an eloquent and impressive sermon was preached by the Venerable the Archdeacon.—Bengal Herald, Sept. 29.

THE NEW CHURCH AT AGUAPARAN.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone for the above intended Building, was performed on Thursday evening after sunset by the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, who, in company with Mrs. Wilson and some other ladies, as well as his domestic Chaplain, and the Rev. Mr. Wybrow, repaired to the spot conducted by Mr. Vos, the Architect. The place appropriated for the edifice, is in the centre of the school compound, and on the bank of the river not far from the Personage. His Lordship commenced the ceremony with a Hymn sung in Bengallee by a group of the female wards of that Institution or Asylum, headed by the Rev. Mr. Wybrow and some assistant female teachers. The Rev. Mr. Frost, the Bishop's domestic Chaplain, then read one of the Psalms of David, suited to the occasion, and His Lordship prayed estemore in a solemn and becoming manner for a blessing on the undertaking—then addressed the assembly composed chiefly of natives, men and women, on the utility of having such a place, where a school and a parsonage were not wanting. The address was interpreted in Bengallee by the Rev. Mr. Wybrow. The Bishop then laid the foundation stone in a solemn manner, using the same form as that used in the act of baptising. The ceremony concluded with a doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessing's flow," &c.

It is a pity the Bishop and others were not there sooner, for it was after sun-set and dark when the ceremony was being performed.

There were those mentioned above present on the interesting occasion, and Messrs. Uday and Molloy, and a few others.

The cleanly, healthy, and apparently happy condition of the orphan girls (about 200 in number) who are refueged and educated at Mrs. Wilson's asylum, and the progress of those poor creatures, once labouring in mental darkness and destitute of the means of support, have made and are making, both in learning and refinement, sanct but lay claim to notice being taken of that truly charitable Lady's laudable exertions and acts, and these speak volumes in her favour. May the Heavenly Blessing ever rest on such Institutions, and endeavours so highly praiseworthy. How many an ignorant and benighted Hindoo female has been plucked up and brought to a home where knowledge is imparted and every comfort afforded!—Correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser, Sept. 29.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—From a perusal of your paper of the 29th ultimo, which was handed to me yesterday by a friend of mine, I find that your Correspondent, "D. C. under Regulation IX. of 1833," has, in reply to the query of "U. D. C.," stated that he has occasionally exercised the powers described in Clause 2, Section 24, Regulation VII. of 1829, and that his proceedings have always been approved of by the Commissioner of his Division. But the Unconscientious Deputy Collectors are not so generally allowed to exercise the above powers, as your Correspondent may be led to suppose. I can just inform him, that the Commissioner of the Division in which I have been posted, has lately issued a Circular to all the Collectors subordinate to him, to the following effect:—That a Deputy Collector under Regulation IX. of 1833, is not authorized to fine a person for disobedience to his order—and that if any person be found guilty of such offence, the case should be submitted to the Collector for his sentence. Your Correspondent is, perhaps, placed under a Commissioner who is favourably disposed towards the Revenue Officers, contemptuously called Regulation IX. Deputy Collectors.

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,

ANOTHER D. C.

RELIGIOUS.

EMBARCATION OF AMERICAN MISSIONARIES.—We learn from the Salem Register, that Rev. Oso French and lady—Rev. David W. Hume and lady—Rev. Ebenezer Briggs and lady, and Miss Cynthia Farrar, were to embark from Salem on Monday, in the brig Waverly, Capt. Ward, for Bombay. They go out under the direction of the American Board, as a reinforcement to the Bombay Mission. At the Tabernacle, on Friday evening, instructions of the Prudential Committee were delivered to the missionaries, by the Rev. Dr. Anderson, one of the Secretaries of the Board, and they were affectionately addressed by the Rev. Mr. Worcester.—Christ. Watchman.

IDOLATRY OF THE MADRAS GOVERNMENT.—The following is a letter from the late R. Cathcart, Esq., of the Madras Civil Service, who was cut off by cholera in May, 1834. It appears in his Memoirs lately published. The system it exhibits is even worse than the endowment of temples, and is more widely diffused. "August 23, 1832.—Among the first official letters I received on coming to Salem, was one sanctioning fifty rupees to be expended, in each of the three Talooks or districts under me, for the invocation of rain. Rain is indeed, much required; the first crops have been almost lost in consequence of the deficiency. I called the Talook servants, to give a report of what was to be done. Some Brahmins were to engage in prayer to one of their gods for ten or twelve days, standing up to their necks in water, that their devotions might, I suppose, be instant. Others were to be employed to avert the anger of certain planets; and some to propitiate other gods. The whole to be fed at the expense of Government; to be superintended by government servants; and to be, in every respect, on the part of Government, seeking for the attainment of its revenue by these means. I could not order it. It does seem to me most gratuitous to engage in such an unprovoked violation of the laws of God. While the money belonging to the Government is regularly paid to them, and not appropriated to any other object, which would be esteemed robbery; while no obstruction is offered to the natives in worshipping what they choose—it seems almost without a cause when we thus uphold other gods. The Revenue Board sanctions disbursements to be made on this account in every collectorate when required. Well may we rather look for the withholding of the rain we seek. How long-suffering is God in ever again granting rain after such idolatry and worshipping of gods, to whom the subsequent goodness of the Lord will be attributed! I have written to the Collector privately, that I could not issue such orders. O Lord, forgive our national sins, and turn our hearts unto thee. The orders were subsequently issued by my three Talooks by the Collector, as well as in his own. There are fourteen Talooks in the district; each received fifty rupees for it; so that 700 rupees were thus expended in the dishonouring of God, and giving his glory to another. O Lord, forgive our iniquity!"

BOMBAY.—Native opinions in connection with the Parsee conversions.—In fulfillment of our promise of last month, we here submit a translation of the prospectus of a "Society for the protection of Hindoos." Very few remarks of ours need be made; the paper will suggest its own comment. It is evidently an elaborate document, and bears very decided testimony to the pains which Christianity has struck into the high places of Hindoos, as well as the fire temples of Zoroaster.

Those who have little time can read what is written in the margin.

Through the reign of the Moosulmans, Portuguese, and English, the Hindoo religion has gone on suffering degradation. Therefore, as this religion is the cause is the sustainer of all welfare. And men are naturally so anxious to preserve their own religion, that for it, some are even sacrificed their lives; but this appeared during the time of the wicked and cruel Mussulmans and Portuguese, who were formerly; the present is not such time. Now the Padrees have adopted measures to sink the Hindoo religion. To annihilate those (measures) abundance of wealth and labour must be expended, for if they are allowed to go on, the Hindoo religion is most sorely in danger. Doubtless calamities happened to the Hindoo religion from the sword of the Mussulmans, but greater calamities than those will occur from the books and schools of the Padrees.

This whole country is filled with Padrees, their schools, and their books. In these schools, and books and in the speaking of these Padrees, there is nothing great or useful; but only such matters as tend to draw the hearts of the people from Hindooism, and make them relish Christianity: and in those places where the Hindoo religion is not much attended to, hundreds of people have forsaken the Hindoo religion; and here, too, several persons, even of high caste, have become apostates.

The impressions received by the mind in childhood, are not easily erased. The thousands of children who are in the Padrees' schools, where they do not hear a single word about the Hindoo religion, but the tenets of Christianity only, having received those tenets as their first impressions, will readily disregard Hindooism, and will grow up without restraint. Should the Padrees see Shri Ganes upon any of the writing boards, they call it the name of Ganes, and rub it out with their shoes; should they see a book of shlokas or abhangas, burn it in the presence of the children. Thus those children see the Hindoo religion disgraced, and Christianity honoured. And these are the children, out of Brahmans and Kshatrias, but of poor people; consequently, they never have an opportunity of learning such things as the ashwas and paranas, and they do not see in their persons an excellent example of walking according to the Hindoo religion.

Such children cannot attend the Society's schools, because they are few and scant; and though they should be sent to these schools, it is not likely that their respect for Hindooism would cease to be displaced by it. In those subjects necessary to business only are taught, and not a single word respecting Hindooism; so that, in every way, the Hindoo religion is endangered. An exactly similar circumstance has befallen them at Calcutta, in Bengal; through which those of the Hindoos of that place who are wise, zealous for their own religion, and wealthy, have omitted and have become diligent to render of non-effect the labours of the Padrees: several new schools and books to confute the Christian tenets and commend Hindooism are in progress, and their excellent effects are being experienced.

Now the seal, for the preservation of their own religion, of the intelligent and noble worthies of this place who are zealous for their own religion, nay, of the whole Hindoo community also, evinces itself like that of a dutiful and affectionate son, zealous to support his parents. And these worthies expend thousands of rupees on the Society, as the gentlemen do on other institutions, and in several instances, many persons for the sake of respect acquire away very much wealth; most gladly therefore will they contribute a trifling portion of their wealth for the support of the Hindoo religion, by means of which all blessings are obtained. Knowing this, we entreat all persons that they would not send their children to the Padrees' schools, but that they would according to their ability contribute something for the accomplishing of this object. The rules are—

1st. Schools are to be established, and books in support of the Hindoo religion to be printed for the use of the children, in proportion to the amount of all the well-being of the Hindoos. It is incumbent upon them to strain every nerve for its preservation.

The Padrees have used most strenuous endeavours to sink the Hindoo religion, and many have begun to apostatise.

The children who attended the Padrees' schools, see and hear nothing from the Padrees, but contempt of Hindooism and commendation of Christianity. Consequently the Hindoos should not send their children to the Padrees' schools, lest in the course of time they should apostatise.

They either tear it up or burn it in the presence of the children. Thus those children see the Hindoo religion disgraced, and Christianity honoured. And these are the children, out of Brahmans and Kshatrias, but of poor people; consequently, they never have an opportunity of learning such things as the ashwas and paranas, and they do not see in their persons an excellent example of walking according to the Hindoo religion.

Knowledge necessary for the transactions of business is obtained from the Society's schools, but it is not likely that their minds will cease to be drawn from Hindooism by this Society.

The great men among the Hindoos of Calcutta in Bengal, have adopted measures to destroy the labours of the Padrees.

The great Hindoos of Bombay have seal like that of a dutiful son for the preservation of their own religion, and they expend thousands of rupees on things of less import; it is not likely, therefore, that they will object to giving a trifle, for the support of their own religion.

Of the methods by which the labours of the Padrees are to be destroyed.

2nd. Each school is to contain about a hundred children; it is to be good and public, and is to be committed to the charge of a wise and excellently qualified teacher. The teachers are to receive nothing from the children, but are to subsist on their salary.

3rd. The branches necessary for transacting business, such as reading, writing, arithmetic, and letter-writing; also good subjects from the Hindoo religion, such as, Bhakti Vigya, and other books of worship, victory, &c., or the new books that are to be printed in support of Hindooism, are to be taught.

4th. There will be a monthly, quarterly, half-yearly, and yearly examination of the schools, an account of which will be given to the great worthies by those who may be the superintendents of the schools; or if practicable, the great nobles may examine, and whatever methods may seem best to them are to be adopted. The system of teaching will be communicated to all. According to that, money will some way or other be expended on the instruction of the children, an account of which, accompanied with the signature of some respectable worthy, will be communicated to all.

5th. The progress of institutions of On the accomplishment this nature is a work of expense; for the purpose of the destruction this purpose let a subscription be raised of the Padrees' labours, according to every one's ability from two annas to a thousand rupees. First of all, money must be collected to meet the present expenditure; and in order that there may be no difficulty in making collections, and giving donations, a quarterly collection will be made, and from whom a donation may be received shall have a receipt given to him, and his signature shall be taken in a book; and from him who may not be able to give in this manner, any thing may be received, at such time as may be most convenient for him to give; thus, money is to be collected quarterly and incidentally.

6th. The humble teachers are to receive a salary of from ten to twelve rupees; there are to be two teachers employed on this salary at present, and one superintendent on the same salary. And if a place cannot be procured gratis, a monthly allowance of three rupees is to be made. Out of this money being accumulated, new books are to be made according to the amount received; and after all these things are settled, the remainder is to be deposited at interest, in the hands of some respectable banker; and this work having succeeded by the truth of God, and a sufficient number of schools having been established in the district of Bombay, they are to be established in other places also.

7th. The work of the superintendents The way to discount it is to visit the schools once every two or three days; and so to conduct themselves towards the teachers, that their desire to instruct the children and do their work diligently, may be increased; to inform the great worthies how many children attend, what they learn, and how the teachers spend to their duties; to pay rent; collect all subscriptions; keep the accounts; and to attend to all matters which concern the money or the schools. These rules appear good at present; but if any one should see a better method of accomplishing the object, and would kindly communicate the same, it would be adopted.

Names of the superintendents and teachers, their caste, residence, age, attainments and their former occupation.—Oriental Christ. Spect.

LITTLE EDUARD.

By Mrs. Sigourney.

"Be good, little Edmund," your mother will say;
"Will whisper it soft in your ear,
And oftentimes repeat it, by night and by day,
That you need not forget it my dear."

And the ant at its work, and the flower-loving bee,
And the sweet little bird in the wood,
As it warbles a song from its nest on the tree,
Seems to say, "Little Eddy, be good."

"Be good," says the Bible—that volume of love—
And the wisest are bound to obey;
For the truths that it teaches will lead us above,
When death falls the spirit away.

For as sure as the brook to the river doth run,
And the river to ocean's broad wave,
This rule, if we'll learn'd from your cradle, my son,
Will prove your best wealth at the grave.

EDUCATION IN PRÆSIA, RUSSIA, AND NORTH AMERICA.

—In connection with this subject may be mentioned, as a sort of curiosity, a Report on Elementary Public Instruction in Europe, made to the State of Ohio, last year, by Prof. Stowe. This gentleman has just made the tour of Europe under a commission from the legislature above named. He says that, in some of the old countries, and where he was uniformly treated in the handsomest manner, much surprise was expressed at his coming abroad with such an errand on behalf of a State just as old as himself; and that only some thirty-six years. He seems to have been impressed deeply with a late "change in the policy of monarchical governments in respect to the education of the people." This he considers to indicate a new era in civilisation. He traces it to the American Revolution. But be that as it may, the old principle of the necessity of popular ignorance, he says, is abandoned. He mentions especially the Prussian, Bavarian, and Russian monarchs, representatives of the three great divisions of Christendom, as taking the lead in this work, and that so efficiently as to have devised better plans of instruction and more thoroughly applied them than the world has ever before witnessed." The object of the movement, he considers, in general terms, to be the prevention of an unbridled democracy, like that, for example, of Revolutionary France; to discipline and civilize the people; to give them, in the safest way, enough of the good of free institutions to satisfy the thirst of the age, without exciting it to demand the destruction of their old forms of government. This education, accordingly, has been accompanied, especially in Prussia and Bavaria, with great improvements in the condition and comforts of the people. At the same time, what was needlessly despotic has been mitigated. The Professor, after remarking that "Frederic William in his dress appearance, and whole deportment, is as unostentatious as an Ohio farmer," acknowledges that he was astounded at the "rigid simplicity of the great military despotism of central Europe," and contrasts it with what he calls the "pageantry, pomp, and ostentation of the limited monarchy of England." Such are the impressions of an intelligent American visiting Europe as a commissioner of education. You will know how to rate these at their real value without comment of mine.

In regard to what is doing in Russia, I am not aware that any so ample or fresh an account as the Professor's has appeared in England. The system, it seems, has gone so far, that the whole empire is divided into educational provinces, each having its own university—these into academic districts, having corresponding institutions—and these again into circles, each with its own elementary school; and, as an inset of the whole, there is a grand model-school, for teachers, at St. Petersburg. In 1835 six of the universities had come into operation. At the date of the last Report of the Minister of Public Instruction, there were 12,000 elementary schools, 430 private ones, and 57 gymnasia. This minister publishes a monthly educational journal, of great value, and circulates it throughout the empire. School directors and examiners are rigidly required to send him reports of their offices. To secure good buildings, an architect has been appointed for each academic district. Liberal provision is made for the support of teachers. Young men, too, are sent abroad: in 1835 there were eighteen at Berlin and several in Vienna. Foreign teachers are welcomed with eagerness. This machinery extends far Siberia, and beyond the Caspian, to the distant Siberian harbours. There is a gymnasium at Tiflis, and fifteen schools in the neighbouring region. Numerous cases are given to show that the mobility and the wealthy take great interest in the system, many of them having contributed large sums to help on rising institutions. A merchant gave 10,000 roubles to found a school, besides offering his own house for the purpose, and free school for three years. This is pure zeal for the cause, since the government makes regular provision for the institutions above named. Much attention is given also to school libraries, &c. These facts are stated by the Professor with evident surprise, and he appeals to the citizens of Ohio, not to be outdone by the Russians.

From the Reports of the Superintendent of Common Schools in New York, just published, I am happy to be able to show that in that State; at least, the exertions of leading intelligent citizens, have not been in vain. On the 1st of July last, 98,300 schools were reported. The average term of instruction was eight months. The number of children in them was 329,113. The whole number of children between five and sixteen years of age, in the same districts, exceeding this number only by 10,034! This may be considered as a fair indication of public sentiment regarding popular education in the Atlantic State: the new ones at the west show symptoms of the same feeling, but they could not be expected to regular their educational measures till the first rough work, which belongs to such communities, is completed. Internal improvements supersede everything else, and the spirit with which these are now carried on astonishes even us, who are used to such spectacles of energy. Michigan did not become a State till 1836, for want of sufficient population, and now they are engaged in the construction of lines of intercourse, chiefly railroads, to the extent of more than 1,100 miles, and have expended out of eight millions of dollars; not to mention twenty-four private companies engaged in smaller thousand miles, at the expense of seven millions more!—American Correspondent of the Athenaeum.

SCIENTIFIC.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY, June 25.—Professor Owen read "Some Notes on the Birth of a Male Giraffe at the Zoological Gardens," which took place on the 19th. The period of gestation has been, as nearly as possible, ascertained to be fourteen months and eighteen days, or fifteen lunar months. The young animal, when born, was perfectly motionless, and apparently dead, or strangled, its lips and nose being tinged with blood; but after gentle friction had been used for a short time, breathing and motion quickly followed. The mother was in no way depressed or debilitated. It came into the world like any mammal, with the eyes open, but the horns were distinctly very large, and very soft and white at their expanded extremities; the skin was marked as distinctly as in the adult; the horns were represented by stiff and long black hairs, and the mane was well developed. It made many vigorous efforts to stand, raising itself on the four knees, and was able to support itself on outstretched legs two hours after birth; in ten hours, it had gained sufficient strength to walk. It suckled with avidity warm cow's milk from a bottle, and once or twice attracted low, gentle grunts or bleats, like a fawn or calf. The mother has not hitherto shown signs of affection or parental care, nor are there any symptoms of her nourishing her offspring; yet once having pushed down the young one when hastily moving away from it, she stood still, and gazed on the prostrate animal with an expression of maternal feeling. An anecdote is told by the keeper of the male giraffe, that whilst one loked on the mother and her young one with listless indifference, the other, the sire, showed great restlessness and impatience to approach them, and when allowed to do so, licked and caressed the young stranger. The length of the young Camaleopard, from the unusual to the setting of the tail, is six feet ten inches; and when standing he can reach with his snouts six feet. The Secretary stated, that though at first it had been deemed advisable not to expose it to the public, it now appeared so lively and healthy that visitors were freely admitted.—Athenaeum.

THE WHITE NILE.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. Timbuctoo to Lord Pringle, dated Alexandria, May 25.—The fleet which the Pasha of Egypt had assembled at Khartoum, for the purpose of exploring the Bahir-el-Ahyal, or White Nile, has just returned from its experimental trip up that river, during which it was about thirty-five days, and reached the country where the Shilluk without encountering any opposition. It consisted of six boats, having each 50 armed men; and, after having lived in a year's provisions, it will start again as soon as the waters begin to rise.—Athenaeum.

GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—Among the maps and donations of the table of the Geographical Society on the 24th June, was a map of Turkey, in four sheets, on a scale of five miles to an inch, from a trigonometrical survey, by Fairbairn, Esq., of the Survey of India, at Florence, and by him presented to the Society; a map of northern Africa, by Segna, presented by Count Ghering of Hohenhausen; a large map of the N. E. frontier of India, by Captain Boleau Pemberton; the original chart of the Gulf of Cambay, in India, by Lieut. Kitchener, of the Indian Navy, exhibiting the nature and form of the shoals which occasion the remarkable, or sudden rise of tide in that gulf; as well as the eastern extension, to the dangerous Malacca banks, also surveyed by that officer during the past year.

The President announced, that in accordance with the recommendation of Major Jervis, now on the eve of his departure for India, as Surveyor General, the Council had that day resolved that a complete set of the London Geographical Journal should be presented to the public libraries of ten of the chief naval and military stations in India, namely,—Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Bangalore, Hyderabad, Mhow, Daulatpore, Khanpur, Meerut, and Delhi.—Athenaeum.

STATE AND PRODUCTS OF THE IRON TRADE.—We learn from a very elaborate paper read by Mr. J. Johnson, before the Liverpool Polytechnic Society, that there are at this time in Scotland fifty furnaces in blast, five out, seven building, and twenty-six contemplated. In South Wales, 122 furnaces in blast, seven out, thirty-one building, and ninety-one contemplated. In 1740 the annual produce of the kingdom was 17,350 tons of cast iron. Mr. Johnson thinks it probable, from the above data, that in 1853 Scotland alone will produce upwards of 360,000 tons, and that within five years 1,000,000 tons will be produced annually in South Wales.—Athenaeum.

AMERICAN GEOLOGY AND MINERAL WEALTH.—Among the selections to which Europe may reasonably expect interesting additions from this country, even in its present unscientific era, is geology. The reason is obvious enough. It is eminently a practical science,—one from the pursuit of which immense economical benefits may be derived. Great attention has accordingly been paid to it recently, with this view. The old states of Massachusetts took the lead. I believe (as in most other matters of the kind,) a few years since, by getting up a State Geological Survey, the results of which were published, and excited considerable interest. It was immediately perceived that the pecuniary interests of the country were involved in these investigations—competition was excited,—and the consequence already is, that something like half the States have taken up. (And in some cases movements of the national government,) have adopted measures for complete geological surveys. This is a point of some importance, even to you English, and not merely in the theoretic cal mass of the world. Nobody has ever doubted, still less can any one doubt now, that the United States are most richly provided with a vast variety of minerals, of the greatest practical necessity and value, which it would be disgraceful to leave any longer wholly neglected, while we yearly spend enormous sums for inferior articles of the same kind, sent to us from foreign countries,—but that I am altogether what is called a Tariff-man, I do not believe in every country, at every stage of its progress, turning its hand to every species of business, under the false and pretence of being independent of the rest of mankind, any more than I believe in the policy of every individual doing the same thing. But there is a reasonable medium. For example, take the State of Maine, with a population of half a million and more—hardly, intelligent, industrious—a territory of 30,000 square miles, a great part of good land for the farmer, but almost all of it unusually rich in mineral resources: yet still within three or four years, scarcely any attention has been paid to this subject. At Bangor, a city of 8,000 inhabitants, grown up almost within the last ten years, full of energy and spirit, almost all the houses are covered at this moment with Welsh slate (from your Bangor), which slate is first imported into New York, or Boston, and thence transported to Bangor. There it costs about 6d. a ton and so it is sold in the State and in every country; but I assume this place as a special sample of genuine American “gold” spirit, and because, moreover, it now turns out, from the published reports of the State geologist, that at and about a place called Williamsburg, which is some thirty or forty miles distant, and on the banks of a navigable river, slate has been all this time reposing quietly, in quantities incalculable, “sufficient for the supply of the whole country;” and yet it is now inferior, or any error laid in roofing. This slate may already be had at Bangor for 1d. a ton, and for 2d. in Boston. Now this, to use the geologist’s words, is as bad as it was for our ancestors to send to Wales for grave-stones, or the New York Dutchmen to Holland for bricks. In another part of the State they had all the granite used in building, till very lately, from Old Massachusetts—a sort of second Old England; and yet it is now estimated that, in that very place, on the banks of a large river, there are more than a hundred millions of tons of granite, of a kind equal both in beauty and useful qualities, to any in the U. S. Maine is incredibly rich in this article. Mosquito Mountain, which rises 300 feet above high water, is all granite. Mount Wadso, which is twice as high, the same; and so on. Again, Maine is full of the most excellent kinds of marble; and yet it is now estimated that some are exported yearly yet “to the Antietam they deliver 16 a tierce for St. John’s line, while the very rocks under their feet are excellent limestone, and wood costs only the cutting.” This is a fair specimen of the general neglect of our mineral resources. Further, in the same State, there is bone-slate, the felspar for porcelain, granite, lead, and vast quantities of valuable iron, “equal to the best from Sweden, and capable of being wrought into the finest kinds of cast-iron.” These descriptions may be relied on as accurate. I select a few out of a great number, merely to illustrate the more general case. Corresponding movements are now everywhere bringing these hidden treasures to light. In Georgia, a branch of the Mint has been lately established, and was a first experiment, dollars 140,000 worth of gold wrought from the immediate vicinity, within the year. In North Carolina, silver mines are beginning to be opened. A massive ingot, said to be the first ever made in this country, was the other day exhibited to the legislature of that State, by one of the owners. In the west, we are told that tin has just been discovered; but this remains to be proved. In Kentucky some air is commencing; the Governor remarked in his late usual “Message,” and I believe, without exaggeration, that there are beds of good iron in that State equal to all the supplies of Great Britain and Ireland, with coal, as in Pennsylvania, in proportion. The latter state, as only the advantage of the former in the start and in her railroads and canals. These have been got up with a view to bring into the market her iron and coal, and they yielded, the last (most unfavourable) season, a revenue of a million of dollars.

These statements are not mere flourishes; far from it. The mineral resources of America are destined to maintain a keeping in the world’s wealth, and we must not let her natural features go. One more mass: the Iron Mountains of Missouri, so called. For a time I thought the accounts of these formations much exaggerated, but numbers of calculating, scientific, and disinterested men have been of the ground, and they there more confirm the backward stories. Among them is Professor Shepherd, of South Carolina College, who thinks the quarries question raised all others both in quality and extent. The Knob Mountain is one entire mass of iron porphyry, of great purity; and the Iron Mountain is so entirely metallic that all the felspar (in which the neighbouring metal is deposited) he saw in surveying it, “would not exceed a pound in weight,”—the great mass being pure antimony peroxide. This hill is two miles round. Here are abundant supplies for a whole continent, surrounded, too, by all the mineral resources required for working it and smelting it by a region admirably situated for commerce. There are said to be ten million dollars’ worth of iron now yearly consumed in the

Meteorology.—Thus far looks. I must now tell you about Mr. Eddy, the rain-maker. You may remember that his theory of storms was referred to and explained by Prof. Haas, at the last meeting of the British Association (Athenæum, No. 565); and in the January Edinburgh Review it was said that if the “new theory does not succeed in supplanting its rival, it cannot fail to lead the utterance of both to a more rigorous examination of their data.” This is rather a rather, considering what Mr. Eddy claims. What this is, I wish to explain, and it can now be done satisfactorily, inasmuch as the theorist has been induced to come out with a full exposé. His object, then, is to manufacture rain, say in time of drought! Mr. Eddy begins by laying down these principles:—1. It is known, he says, that if air should be expanded into double the volume by diminished pressure, it would be cooled about ninety degrees of Fahrenheit. 2. I have shown, he says, by experiment, that if air at the common dew point in summer, in time of drought, 71 degrees, should go up in a column to a height sufficient to expand it by diminished pressure into double the volume, it would condense into water or visible cloud (by the cold of expansion) more than one-half of its vapour—a quantity sufficient to produce nearly three inches of rain. 3. It is known by chemical principles, that the caloric, that is, of electricity given out during the condensation of this vapour, would be equal to about 20,000 tons of anthracite coal burnt on each square mile over which the cloud extended. 4. I have shown by experiment that this caloric of electricity would prevent the air from cooling only about half as much as it would, if it had no vapour in it, or about forty-five degrees at the height assumed, which would cause the air in the cloud to be, at that height, about forty-five degrees warmer than the air on the outside of the cloud at the same height. I have shown from these principles [“Journal of the Franklin Institute for 1836”] that the barometer would fall, under the cloud thus formed, in favourable circumstances, as much as it is known to fall sometimes under the middle of a dense and lofty cloud; and that consequently the air would rush in on all sides towards the centre of the cloud and upwards in the middle, and thus constitute the condensation of the vapour and the formation of cloud and the generation of rain. I have shown, also, that the air does move upwards on all sides towards the centre of the space or region where a great rain is falling, and of course upwards, after it comes in under the cloud, which is as much lighter than the surrounding air, at least, that it does so in all storms investigated, which have now almost all been broken several times over in all of which the trees were thrust with their tops upwards. From these principles, established by experiment, and confirmed by observation, it follows, that if a large body of air is made to ascend in a column, a large cloud will be generated, and that that cloud will contain in itself a self-sustaining power, which may move from the place over which it was formed, and cause the air over which it passes to rise up into it, and thus form more cloud and rain, until the rain may become general; for many storms which commenced in the West Indies, very narrow, are known to move from the place of beginning several thousand miles, widening out and increasing in size, until they become many hundred miles wide.”

Mr. Eddy now goes on to say, that if his reasoning be correct, that rain, great fire and the bursting out of volcanoes should make rain; and he thinks there is proof that they do so. From some of these principles, too, it might be expected that clouds would form over large cities and towns, where much fuel is burnt; and Mr. Eddy says it is found to be so. He refers to Manchester for proof, and also to Mallett’s statements, in his collection of facts concerning the Ashby coal-field. The connection, then, he argues, between fire and rain, is not accidental. “Humboldt has acknowledged this in the case of volcanoes, when he speaks of the mysterious connection between volcanoes and rain, and says that when a volcano bursts out in South America in a dry season it sometimes changes it to a rainy one.” Mr. Eddy, of course, thinks that he has cleared up this “mystery,” and that what applies to volcanoes applies to other fires in proportion. He explains why they do not always make rain, and states that he is willing to undertake experiments in proof of his argument, provided Congress or the Pennsylvania Legislature will reward him in the event of his being successful.—Athenæum.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PETITION OF THE HON. EAST INDIA COMPANY TO THE IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

“Sheweth,—1. That the subjects of the British Crown in Asia, under the government of the Hon. East India Company, amount to about 100,000,000 of industrious and intelligent people, who possess strong claims on the consideration of the Imperial Parliament.

“2. That British India is not a burden on the finances of England, but, on the contrary, yields an annual revenue of nearly 20,000,000 sterling; by which an army of 30,000 Europeans and 175,000 native troops is maintained, and honorable and useful employment is furnished to many of our countrymen as civil townsmen both at home and abroad; and that by reason of its great extent of territory, vast population and immense resources, it materially contributes to the political power, maritime strength, and general prosperity of the British Empire.

3. That British India being possessed of a fertile soil, great variety of climate, and abundance of skilful labour, is capable of supplying Europe with almost every species of tropical produce of the best quality, at the cheapest rate; but that at present England enjoys a very small portion of the commercial advantages which British India offers to the merchants, manufacturers and artisans of the United Kingdom.

4. That for a quarter of a century British goods have been admitted, by a law of the Imperial Parliament, into all the ports of British India free of duty, as regards woollens, metals, wrought and unwrought, marine stores, &c., and at a duty not exceeding 2½ per cent. on cottons and on all other goods; but the raw produce and manufactures prepared in India by her fellow-subjects during the same period have had onerous, and in some instances, prohibitory, duties imposed on them on their introduction into the ports of the United Kingdom, whilst the productions of foreign states in amity with us have been freely admitted under the reciprocity system.

5. That the consequence of such a course of proceeding has been the destruction, to an immense extent, to the manufacturers of British India, whereby several hundred thousands of our fellow-subjects have been ruined; whilst the endeavours to introduce the raw products of the soil into the United Kingdom have not met with such encouragement as to alleviate the privation and distress produced by partial legislation, or to enable the people of India to become extensive purchasers of British manufactures.

6. That it is the opinion of your petitioners that the Imperial Parliament, by adopting a system of a sound and generous policy towards India, might enable this country to become independent of all foreign nations for the regular supply of those staple articles on which her manufactures depend, and at the same time obtain a large and certain mart for her own commerce, whereby the people of England and of India would be united by the strong tie of mutual advantage, and our dominion in the East would rest on the broad and sure foundation of justice.

7. That your petitioners being entrusted with the responsible duty of governing British India, and being anxiously solicitous for the welfare and happiness of millions of their subjects committed to their care, earnestly desire the appointment of a select committee of your hon. house to investigate the commercial relations between England and India, with a view to the speedy and effectual adoption of such measures as may accrue to our fellow-subjects in India, and to the speedy and complete recovery, as they are so fully entitled, but which in the opinion of your petitioners, would equally promote the commercial, financial and political interests of both countries.

Sir C. Forbes seconded the motion, and having expressed his entire concurrence in the views taken by his honourable friend, Mr. Martin, suggested, that he should put his petition in the shape of resolutions, on which, when considered by the Court, a petition might hereafter be founded.

Mr. M. Martin, with the permission of the court, adopted this suggestion.

Mr. Majuribanks also concurred in having the matter in the shape of resolutions.

A proprietor (whose name we did not learn) contended that there was no ground for saying that the high duties on Indian produce and manufactures was the cause of the decrease of her exports to this country. In 1803, when there was a duty of 67 per cent. on them, her exports were about 14,000,000*l.*, but in 1836, when they were not more than 10*l.* on wine, and not exceeding 20 per cent. on others, the exports did not exceed 108,000*l.* The decrease was not caused by the duty, but rather by the superiority of British machinery, which had so far outdone Indian competition.

If the whole duties on Indian produce were removed, it would not avail against British competition. There was, therefore, he contended, no cause to go to Parliament within this respect. India had no reason to complain if she was treated like other colonies, and she was so in all respects as to produce, except in the duty on rum, which was 13*l.* the gallon. The great object of the friends of India should be to encourage by all means the culture of cotton, indigo, and those other products which she was so well fitted to raise.

Sir R. Campbell was in favour of an equalization of duty, for though the reduction would not enable India to compete with our machinery, that was no reason why an abuse should be continued. We had drawn millions from India, of which not a billing went back, and it was impossible it could support such a drain, unless we did something to aid it. Even a small reduction would show the people of that country, we were disposed to do them justice. In addition to this, we should give every encouragement to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industry of India. This could not injure us, but on the contrary, would benefit us much.

Colonel Sykes was in favour of reciprocal duties. They would be a bond of union between India and Great Britain, as they would show that we were disposed to deal justly with India, and the stability of our Government there depended on the sense entertained of our justice.

Mr. Pearce suggested that the resolution should be submitted to the Court of Directors. He agreed that one great object should be to encourage the culture of the raw material (cotton), so as to compete successfully with the American market. He should like to see India relieved from unequal duties, and it was a satisfaction to know that even now her condition was improving, as was proved by her increased consumption of British produce.

Mr. Wrelding did not see any necessity for a reference to a committee of a House of Commons of a matter so obvious as the state of our commercial relations with India. Some of these might be altered, for it was due to India that we should treat her more as a nation and less as a colony.

The Chairman said that the Court of Directors had not been on a backward in urging the commercial relations of India on the attention of Government, as some remarks of the hon. proprietor (Mr. Martin) would seem to imply. They had strongly urged the admission of the Mysore Coffee at a lower duty, so as to be on a footing with the same produce of our other possessions. As to the resolutions before the Court, he concurred in their general principles; but as there were some points in them on which there might be some points of difference, he had drawn up a resolution which he would propose in their stead, and which he hoped the Court would adopt. The resolution was that, concurring generally in the principles of the resolutions (proposed by Mr. Martin), the Court of Directors be requested to prepare and lay before the Court a petition of both Houses of Parliament, praying that the duties now levied on the productions and manufactures of India be placed on an equitable footing with reference to other parts of Her Majesty's dominions.

After a few observations from Mr. Wilson (who showed that the exports of India had increased from 200,000*l.* in 1793 to upwards of 7,000,000*l.* in 1836) and from Mr. Chapman (who contended that there should be a perfect equality of duties between the two countries), the resolution (of the Chairman) was put, and carried unanimously.

The Chairman then called the attention of the Court to the Bill (now pending in Parliament) for confirming certain rules and orders of the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India.

Sir C. Forbes thought that such a Bill would annihilate the independence of those courts.

Mr. Serjeant Spankie said that the Bill referred only to regulations of pleadings in those courts, and was brought in by the Government in consequence of some doubts expressed by the advocates of the Crown as to whether in some regulations already made in some of the Supreme Courts of Judicature they had not exceeded their authority.

Mr. Lewis saw no necessity for sending the rules first to the Governor-General in Council, and then to the Privy Council here. A more simple mode would be to make all the rules of pleading, in our Courts at Westminster, apply to the Courts in India.—The Bill was then approved of, and the Court adjourned.

ANATOLIC SOCIETY, June 15.—Prof. Wilson in the chair.

His Highness Nizam Mahmood was elected an honorary member; and a donation from his Highness, consisting of fourteen volumes of Turkish works, printed at the Imperial Press at Constantinople, was laid upon the table. Thomas Newnham, Esq., presented several ancient gold Hindoo coins and medals, three Persian MSS., &c. And from G. W. Traill, Esq., the Society received an immense sheet of paper, measuring sixty feet by twenty-five, made at Kanton, as a specimen of the native manufacture's skill. This donation was accompanied by a memorandum written by Mr. Traill, descriptive of the processes of making the paper, and of the useful quality it possessed of being invulnerable to the attacks of insects. The Chevalier Etienne Fissani, and Count Alexander Fissani, of Constantinople, were elected non-resident members.

An Analysis, by Mr. W. Morley, of a portion of the "Jawid Tawrik, of Reshideddin," which has hitherto been supposed to be lost, was read to the meeting. The paper stated that the original work of Reshideddin comprehended four volumes; of these, the first comprised a history of the Turks and Mongols to the time of Oghis; the second continued the same history to the time of the writer, with several other matters; the third volume contained a history of Mohammed, and the Arab tribes from whom he descended; and the fourth was chiefly geographical. Of all these, the first volume is the only one that has been hitherto known to exist; and a portion of that volume has been recently published by the French Government, with a translation by M. Quatremer. The remaining volumes are rarely mentioned even by Oriental writers; and are supposed to have been destroyed several centuries ago. The part of which an analysis was read to the meeting, is a portion of the second volume. The copy is of great antiquity, and was written in the lifetime of the author; in fact, within four years after he had completed his history. It is only a fragment, but it is well preserved, written in a beautiful hand, on large paper, and extends to fifty-nine folios, with numerous paintings, very well executed. The first part contains portions of the life of Mohammed, and is illustrated by three paintings. The second contains portions of a History of China, and is illustrated by numerous paintings of the kluge recorded in the text; this portion is merely fragmental.

The names are Chinese, but the numbering of the dynasties, and the synchronisms with historical matter, better known to us, by no means accord with the accounts of the history of China, as we have it in modern writers. The third part contains the history of India; and, with the exception of one little blunder, is complete. This is divided into two sections: the first begins with the chronology, geography, and natural history of India; and goes on to detail the history and geographical of the Kings of Delhi previous to the Mohammedan invasion—gives an account of Cashmere and its kings—and concludes with a history of the Brahman kings of the four yugas. The second section contains an account of the Hindu deities, whom it names prophetically—it specifies Mahishur, Vishnu, and Brahma, evidently Mahaveera, Vishnu, and Brahma,—and then proceeds to Shikumi, or Buddha, on whose birth, history, and qualifications it more especially dilates; in fact, nearly the whole of this section treats of the precepts and practice of Buddhism, or the religion founded by Shikumi. The fourth book is only a fragment; it contains the history of the Jews according to the Mohammedan tradition, and is illustrated by fine paintings. The reading of the paper was not concluded, but we understand that it will appear in a forthcoming number of the Society's Journal. The meetings were adjourned till November.—Athenaeum.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CAVE-TEMPLE ON THE SALWEN ABOUT TWENTY MILES ABOVE NOGHEEM.—"The entrance is at the bottom of a perpendicular but uneven face of the mountain, inclosed in a strong brick wall, which forms a large vestibule. The entrance to this inclosure is by a path, winding along the foot of the mountain, and nothing remarkable strikes the eye as one issues the gate, where the attention is at once powerfully arrested. Not only is the space within the wall filled with images of Gaudama of every size, but the whole face of the mountain, to the height of eighty or ninety feet, is covered with them. On every jutting crag stands some marble image, covered with gold, and spreading its arms in proportion to the setting sun. Every recess is converted into a shrine for others. The smooth surfaces are strewed by small flat images of burnt clay and set in stucco. Of these last there are literally thousands. In some places they have fallen off, with the plaster with which they were set, and left spots of naked rock, against which bees have built their hives undisturbed. Nowhere in the country have I seen such a display of wealth, ingenuity, and industry. But imposing as is this spectacle, it seems to be insignificant, compared to the scene which opens on entering the cavern itself. It is of vast size chiefly in its upper part, which leads to human art to render it sublime. The eye is confounded, and the heart appalled, at the prodigious exhibition of imagination and fully. Everywhere, on the floor, overhead, on the jutting pinnas, and on the striae-like festoons of the roof are crowded together images of Gaudama—the offerings of successive ages. Some are perfectly gilded; others incased with calcareous matter; some fallen, yet sound; others mouldered; others just erected. Some of these are of stupendous size; some not larger than one's finger, and some of all the intermediate sizes; marble, stone, wood, brick, and clay. Some even of marble, are so tiny, that, through sheltered of course from changes of temperature, that the face and fingers are obliterated. In some dark recesses, but were heard, and seemed numerous, but could not be seen clearly. Here there are models of temples, pyramids, [monasteries], &c., some not larger than a half bushel, and some ten or fifteen feet square, absolutely filled with small idols, heaped promiscuously one upon another. As we followed the paths which wound among the groups of figures and models, every new aspect of the cave presented new multitudes of images. A ship of five hundred tons could not carry away the half of them."—Macleod's Travels.

"THE ADVANTAGES THAT HAVE RESULTED TO THE PEOPLE OF TENASSERIM FROM THEIR HAVING BEEN PLACED UNDER BRITISH REVENUE OR BURMESE RULE."—"In the Tenasserim provinces, various improvements are perceptible. Coin is getting introduced instead of masses of lead and silver; manufactures are improving; implements of improved construction are used; justice is better administered; life is secure; property is sacred; religion is free; taxes, though heavy, are more equitable; imposed; and courts of justice are pure, generally. Formerly, men were deterred from gathering round them comforts superior to their neighbours, or building better houses, for fear of exactions. Now, being secure in their earnings, the newly-built houses are much improved in size, materials, and workmanship. There are none of those traps and trammels which embarrass courts in England and America. The providing officer in each province, Amherst, Thway, and Mergui, sits as magistrate on certain days every week; and before him every citizen, male or female, without the intervention of lawyers, may plead his cause, and have immediate redress. Every where, in British Burmah, the people praise English justice; but they are not yet reconciled to regular taxation. Though the Burman government, or its representative agents, took from them more than they pay now, yet it was occasional; consisted chiefly in labour, and they were not under the necessity of serving anything against a certain day—a matter to which they have been altogether unaccustomed."—Ibid.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE BURMESE.—"What a wretched government is this, which, while it taxes and burdens the people to the very utmost, grants them, in return, no security for person or property! Hence the huddling together in little wretched villages. A Burman with anything in loss would not dare to live so far from every one mile from a village. No such case probably exists in the empire. The very poorest, and the Karens, who are always very poor, venture to live in villages of three or four houses in the jungle, and cultivate patches of rice. The people at large live in the bondage of constant fear. Not only is thieving common, but robbing by bands. Thirty or fifty men, well armed and disguised, surround a house, while a detachment plunders it, and permit no one to go to their aid. On the rivers, robberies are even more frequent, as the chance of detection is less. We have scarcely a missionary family that has not been robbed."—Ibid.

INTERESTING CHARACTER IN SIAM.—"Chow Fah Noi is the probable successor to the throne; and in fact is now entitled to it, rather than the present monarch, who is an illegitimate son. Should he assume the government, Siam must advance from her present lowliness and semi-civilization. No man in the kingdom is so qualified to govern well. His naturally fine mind is enlarged and improved by intercourse with foreigners, by the perusal of English works, by studying English and Newton, by freeing himself from a bigoted attachment to Buddhism, by easily recognizing our superiority, and a readiness to adopt our arms. He understands the use of the sextant and chronometer, and was anxious for the latest nautical almanac, which I promised to send him. His little daughters, accustomed to the sight of foreigners, so far from showing any signs of fear, always came to sit upon my lap, though the yellow cassette in their hands was sure to be transferred in part to my dress. One of them took pride in requesting to me a few words of English, and the other took care to display her power of projecting the elbow forward. This singular custom, as has been mentioned, prevails in Burmah, and is deemed very genteel."—Ibid.

STEAM MEETING.—In consequence of the disappointment inflicted on the community of Calcutta, by the untimely departure of the Berenice, without our Mails, a meeting was held in Calcutta, last Saturday evening, to petition Government on the present state of Steam Communication between Calcutta and London. The object of the meeting was, in some measure, anticipated, by an announcement, published the preceding day, by Mr. Robertson, our Deputy Governor, that orders would be issued to the Government of Bombay, not to allow the Steamers in future to leave the Port, till after the arrival of the packets despatched by all the Presidencies, on the last officially safe day. The Post Master in Calcutta will, we fancy, be constrained to allow a longer period in future for the transmission of the Mail, than has hitherto been the practice; and he will thus furnish a beautiful comment on that declaration of the Court of Directors, that the Mails should be conveyed across the country in ten days.

The meeting was addressed, with his usual spirit and humour, by Mr. Parker, a friend, or relative of whom,—he did not state the relationship,—farther than it may be indicated by identity in the initials, H. M. P. drew up the very able position which was unanimously adopted. Mr. Turton shewed his friends in Calcutta, that his eloquence had lost none of its vigour by his journey across the Atlantic; and Capt. Taylor, who opened the meeting, pointed out, in forcible language, the necessity which had led to its being convened. It was diversified by a slight passage of arms between two barristers, Mr. Clarke and Mr. James Hume, the latter of whom delivered his maiden speech, which was very brilliant and promising, and was frequently interrupted with cheers.
